SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3, 1935

The 3d of January being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States (as amended by the twentieth amendment) for the annual meeting of Congress, the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following

PRAYER

O Thou who art holy above the awfulness of sin, yet ever merciful, we acknowledge our transgressions and our sin is ever before us. Grant to us in this hour of wordless longing the vision of Thy glory, the sense of Thy presence, and the leading of Thy love, that human hearts may apprehend Thee everywhere and faith be deepened with the weight and woe of years.

Guide Thou this Nation by the sweet compulsions of Thy will into the deeper life, this suffering human life, wherein the Christ still lives and breathes and holds His way divine, that in the highway thronged with men and in each quiet corner we all may find His image and be conformed thereto.

And we humbly beseech Thee to bless our President, refresh him with Thy spirit day by day, in body and soul, for the great work to which he has been called, and give him wisdom and strength to know and to do Thy will.

Upon our Vice President, the Members of the Congress, and all in authority do Thou bestow the abundance of Thy grace, and may every Member of the Senate, in the exacting days that lie ahead, be found too strong for fear, too noble for anger, too great for worry, with ready hands of helpfulness, scarred in helping others, knowing the lowly ways of suffering and pain through which alone man's spirit climbs those shining heights, white with the presence of the living God. Grant this for the sake of Him who is ever the human shadow of Thine infinite love, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CREDENTIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of a number of Senators-elect which have been sent to the desk, and, without objection, the credentials will be read and placed on file.

The Chief Clerk (John C. Crockett) proceeded to read the certificate of election of KEY PITTMAN, elected a Senator from the State of Nevada.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that credentials found to be in due and usual form by the Secretary be not read but be printed in the RECORD and placed on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The credentials of Senators-elect laid before the Senate by the Vice President and ordered to be placed on file and to be printed in the RECORD, are as follows:

Mr. HASTINGS presented the credentials of JOHN G. TOWNSEND, of Delaware, which were ordered to be placed on file and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF DELAWARE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 6th day of November 1934, JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr., was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Delaware a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years, beginning on the 3d day of January 1935.

In witness whereof I, C. D. Buck, Governor of the State of Delaware, have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of said State to be hereunto affixed this 15th day of November, A. D. 1934, and of the independence of the United States of America, the one hundred and fifty-ninth.

C. D. BUCK.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] CHARLES D. GRANTLAND,
Secretary of State.

Mr. DAVIS presented the credentials of JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, of Pennsylvania, which were ordered to be placed on file and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NAME AND BY AUTHORITY OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, GOVERNOR'S OFFICE.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 6th day of November 1934 JOSEPH F. GUFFEY was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Pennsylvania a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years, beginning on the 3d day of January 1935.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, Gifford Pinchot, and our seal hereto affixed at Harrisburg, Pa., this 6th day of December, A. D. 1934.

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] JOHN J. OWENS,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CAREY presented the credentials of JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, for both the short and long terms, which were ordered to be placed on file and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, November 23, 1934.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 6th day of November 1934 JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Wyoming a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the unexpired portion of the term of Hon. John B. Kendrick, deceased, said term ending at noon on the 3d day of January 1935.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, Leslie A. Miller, and our seal hereto affixed at Cheyenne, Wyo., this 23d day of November, A. D. 1934.

LESLIE A. MILLER, Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, November 23, 1934.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 6th day of November 1934 JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Wyoming a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for a term of 6 years, beginning on the 3d day of January 1935.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, Leslie A. Miller, and our seal, hereto affixed, at Cheyenne, Wyo., this 23d day of November, A. D. 1934.

LESLIE A. MILLER, Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, under the statute of the State of Vermont, the canvassing board cannot convene until the 9th of January, as authorized by the legislature. In lieu of the usual credentials, therefore, I offer a certificate of the Secretary of State and the Governor of the State of Vermont showing the election, precinct by precinct and poll by poll, of WARREN R. AUSTIN as Senator from the State of Vermont. When the certificate shall be issued and received, I will offer it for filing in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand there are a number of precedents for the request of the Senator from Oregon, and also that no question has arisen or has been suggested to the Senate as to the election of the Senator from Vermont. I therefore make no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the certificate will be received and filed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH

The VICE PRESIDENT. As is the custom, the clerk will call the names of the newly elected Senators; and as their names are called, they will present themselves at the desk and take the oath of office.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, the Senator-elect from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], being a member of the special committee appointed at the last session to investigate conditions in the Philippine Islands, is necessarily absent from the country, performing that service for the Senate. In consequence, he is unable to be present and take the oath of office made necessary by his reelection. His credentials have been received and are now on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will proceed to call the names of the newly elected Senators.

The legislative clerk (Emery L. Frazier) called the names of Mr. ASHURST, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. BACHMAN, and Mr. BILBO.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. HARRISON, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. BURKE, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CONNALLY, and Mr. COPELAND.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. NORRIS, Mr. GLASS, Mr. SHEPPARD, and Mr. WAGNER, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. CUTTING, Mr. DONAHEY, Mr. FRAZIER, and Mr. GERRY.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. HATCH, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. NYE, and Mr. METCALF, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. GUFFEY, Mr. HALE, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. KING.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. DAVIS, Mr. WHITE, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. THOMAS of Utah, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. MALONEY, Mr. MINTON, and Mr. HATCH.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. DUFFY, Mr. LONERGAN, Mr. VAN NUYS, and Mr. CUTTING, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. MOORE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. O'MAHONEY, and Mr. PITTMAN.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. CAREY, and Mr. ASHURST, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. RADCLIFFE, Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. TRAMMELL.

The Senators, escorted by Mr. BAILEY, Mr. BONE, Mr. SCHALL, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. FLETCHER, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. TRUMAN, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. WHEELER.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. CLARK, Mr. COUZENS, Mr. COOLIDGE, and Mr. MURRAY, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

| Clark | Hatch | Radcliffe | |

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] on Senate business in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably absent. I will let this announcement stand for the week.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to announce the absence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] because of illness, and the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], occasioned by a temporary illness.

I also beg to announce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], occasioned by being on a governmental mission to the Philippine Islands.

I desire further to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] is detained by important matters in his State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 1), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The Vice President appointed Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. MCNARY the committee on the part of the Senate.

[1] Oath not administered.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. McNARY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 2), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 3), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian unless otherwise ordered.

TELEGRAM FROM SENATOR LONG

Mr. WHEELER. I send to the desk a telegram which I have just received from the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 3, 1935.

United States Senator BURTON K. WHEELER,
Senate Office Building:

Please announce or have announced for me in the Senate that on Monday, or on the first day that the Senate is in session next week, as soon as I can obtain the floor I shall speak on the propositions heretofore mentioned in the public press with which I am identified.

HUEY P. LONG,
United States Senator.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am advised that it is necessary to consider at some time during this afternoon a concurrent resolution arranging for a joint session of the two Houses, to be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives tomorrow on the occasion when the President will deliver his annual message to the Congress. For that reason I am about to move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon; and I will state that it is not expected that other business than the concurrent resolution referred to will be considered today.

I move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the message which I had anticipated would be sent over from the other House has not as yet reached the Senate. I, therefore, ask that the Senate stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate thereupon took a recess subject to the call of the Vice President.

At 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the Senate reassembled at the call of the Vice President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled; that JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, had been elected Speaker; that South Trimble, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, had been elected Clerk; and that the House is ready for business.

The message also informed the Senate that a committee of three members had been appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives, to join with the committee on the part of the Senate, to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House had assembled and that Congress was ready to receive any communication that he might be pleased to make, and that the Speaker had appointed Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. DOUGHTON, and Mr. SNELL the members of the committee on the part of the House of Representatives.

The message announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 4th day of January 1935, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. McNARY advanced in the center aisle, and

Mr. ROBINSON said: Mr. President, the committee of the Senate, acting in conjunction with a similar committee of the House, under the instructions of this honorable body and of the House, beg leave to report that in accordance with the resolution they have advised the President that the Senate is now in session and ready to receive any communication he may desire to make. They report also that the President expects to communicate with the Senate and House of Representatives in joint session tomorrow at 12:30 o'clock p. m.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 4th day of January 1935, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, January 4, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3, 1935

This being the day fixed by the twentieth amendment of the Constitution for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the Members-elect of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress met in their Hall, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Hon. South Trimble, Clerk of the last House.

The Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., Chaplain of the last House, offered the following

PRAYER

Great and marvelous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty! Let Thy work appear unto Thy servant and Thy glory unto their children. We would be still and know that Thou art God! We most humbly acknowledge our sins. Forgive and teach us that every renunciation brings us nearer the height of upright and heroic living. Strengthen us with that fortitude of soul that persists through difficulty and sorrow. The years gone by are ours by inheritance; the fruits of the present depend upon us. Lay Thy hand upon us that the welfare of our country may be held in the folds of every conscience, and lead us to carry our load of obligations to the altar of the Lord. Heavenly Father, inspire this Congress to ever safeguard the rights and contentment of our fellow citizens until the waste places of our land shall blossom as the rose. Unite us in a fellowship of cooperation for the common good and help us to act nobly in all the intricate relationships of life.

O Father of infinite mercy, we wait in this sacred stillness with urgent breath as we pray for our President. O abide with him, sustain him with good health, and crown him with wisdom divine. We bear upon our lips a prayer for our Speaker and all other Members of this Chamber, that each succeeding day they may have Thy unerring guidance. Bless the officers and the employees with glad and untroubled hearts. O Thou who "art the ancient of days", hear, Oh, hear us. This ageless world with its mutilated hopes is in pieces internationally, economically, and racially. We beseech Thee to direct us to be its good friend by lifting the bogs of human misery and looking forward to the final victory of good over evil. Let religious and civic liberty become coextensive with man everywhere. O God of love, may happiness stand as a vestal virgin upon all our thresholds of all our homes, and may all hearts echo with heavenly music. We pray in the name of the world's Savior, whose crown mocks all the diadems of time. Amen.

REPRESENTATIVES-ELECT

The CLERK. Members-elect, we are standing on the threshold of an incoming Congress. We are erecting today a new milestone in the annals of the political history of this Nation.

This is the first time in 146 years that an old Congress dies and a new one is born on the 3d day of January.

Since the birth of the First Congress in 1789 this historical event has taken place every 2 years on the 4th day of March.

Today we inaugurate the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, convened under the provision of the twentieth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

From the days of the Continental Congresses to the present time, the Clerk of the outgoing Congress is authorized and directed by law to prepare the official roll of Members to the incoming Congress, call the House to order, and preside over its deliberations until the Speaker is elected.

The official roll of the Seventy-fourth Congress has been prepared, with the result that out of a total Membership of 435, 434 have properly filed duly authenticated credentials, in accordance with the law of their respective States and the United States, leaving one vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Frederick Landis, of the Second District of Indiana.

The first procedure now in order is to call the official roll of the House by States to ascertain if there be a quorum present.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members-elect answered to their names:

The CLERK. The roll call discloses the presence of 425 Members. A quorum is present.

The Clerk will state that credentials regular in form have been filed showing the election of ANTHONY J. DIMOND as Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, and of SAMUEL W. KING as Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii. The Clerk has received several communications relative to the latter certificate, which will be transmitted to the House for its information.

Two Resident Commissioners to the United States from the Philippine Islands are elected by the Philippine Legislature triennially. A certificate certifying to the election of FRANCISCO A. DELGADO and of PEDRO GUEVARA is on file, showing their election as Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands for the term of 3 years beginning January 3, 1935.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

The next business in order is the election of the Speaker. Nominations will now be received.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Clerk, as chairman of the Democratic caucus of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I am directed by the unanimous vote of the caucus to present as the candidate for the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress the name of Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee. [Applause.]

The CLERK. Are there further nominations?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Clerk, by direction and authority of the Republican conference, representing the minority of the Membership of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I nominate as Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL, a Representative of the State of New York. [Applause.]

The CLERK. Are there further nominations?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Clerk, by direction and authority of the Progressive conference, I have the honor to nominate as Speaker of the House of Representatives during the continuance of the Seventy-fourth Congress, Hon. GEORGE J. SCHNEIDER, a Representative from the State of Wisconsin. [Applause.]

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative-elect from the State of Tennessee, and Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL, a Representative-elect from the State of New York and Hon. GEORGE J. SCHNEIDER, a Representative-elect from the State of Wisconsin have been placed in nomination.

The CLERK. Are there further nominations? There being no further nominations, the Clerk appoints the gentlewoman from New York, Mrs. O'DAY: the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCORMACK; the gentleman from California, Mr. BURNHAM; the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. DIRKSEN; and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. SAUTHOFF to act as tellers. They will please come forward and take their seats at the desk. The roll will now be called, and those responding will indicate by surname the nominee of their choice.

The tellers having taken their places, the House proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker. The following is the vote in detail:

ANSWERED "PRESENT"

| | | |
| Schneider | Snell | Welch |

The CLERK. The tellers agree in their tally. The total number of votes cast is 426, of which Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS has received 317, Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL 95, Hon. GEORGE J. SCHNEIDER 9, and Hon. W. P. LAMBERTSON 2. Three Members have voted "present." Therefore Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative-elect from the State of Tennessee, having received a majority of all of the votes cast, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. SCHNEIDER, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BOLAND, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CROSSER, and the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, Mrs. ROGERS, will please notify Mr. BYRNS of his election and conduct him to the chair.

The Clerk designates the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, the Member longest in continuous service in the House, to administer the oath of office to the Speaker-elect, as prescribed by law.

PRESENTATION OF THE SPEAKER-ELECT

The committee appointed by the Clerk escorted Mr. BYRNS to the chair.

Mr. SNELL. Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress, for the third successive time it has been my privilege to present to the Members of this House my successful rival for the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] You know there is an old saying, "Three times and out." When I looked over our number, I am not exactly sure when that "out" is going to come, but it will not always be thus. I was here myself when the Republicans had nearly as large a majority as the Democrats have at the present time.

Yet there is a silver lining to every cloud, and the silver lining at this time to me is that each time I presented to you not only a very warm and close personal friend but a man who was well qualified to fill the exalted position of Speaker of this House. [Applause.] Your present choice is no exception. Mr. BYRNS comes to this position well qualified and by every rule of the game is richly entitled to the honor you have so generously conferred upon him. His party loyalty, his ability, his successful leadership of the majority in the last House, his long experience in handling legislative matters well qualify him to assume the duties and responsibilities of the great office of Speaker.

Mr. BYRNS, I consider that you are exceptionally well fitted to fill this position, and I know that I speak the minds and will of your colleagues in the House, Republicans as well as Democrats, when I say that we believe you will perform these duties with fairness and justice to all, with great honor to yourself and to the party you represent. You have well performed every duty assigned you and are about to receive the fruition of long and faithful service, and I sincerely congratulate you upon reaching the goal of your ambition. I now present you the gavel; and to the Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress I am very pleased to present your Speaker-elect, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER-ELECT. Ladies and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I appreciate, more than I can possibly express, the very complimentary remarks of the minority leader. BERT SNELL and I have served in Congress together for many years. I am also happy to say that during all those years we have been close personal friends, glad to work and cooperate with each other whenever the question of party fealty was not involved.

For the past 2 years we have been sitting upon opposite sides of the aisle, as the leaders of our respective parties. Our service in that capacity was always cordial and friendly, and I think I may say, cooperative. I always found that BERT SNELL was ready to cooperate in every way he could when it did not interfere with his allegiance to the party of which he is one of the shining ornaments. [Applause.]

You know, my friends, BERT SNELL'S word is his bond. There is no more dependable man in this Chamber than he, and I am happy to number him among my close personal and intimate friends. [Applause.]

A sense of humility at the size of the job that is ahead of me must merge with my expression of appreciation at the honor of having been chosen to preside over the greatest legislative body on earth.

It is a man-sized job that my Democratic friends and colleagues have given me. I thank them most heartily for their generous support. It is gratifying beyond words that they have such confidence in me, and as I assume this position I can only say that I shall try with all that is in me to live up to what they believe me to be. [Applause.]

Also, I wish to thank the minority party who have voted for their nominee, the distinguished statesman and splendid gentleman, BERT SNELL—whom I am proud to call "friend"—for the evidence of their good will and cordial friendship.

A former distinguished Speaker of the House said on a similar occasion that the functions and duties of the Speakership divide into two general classes, parliamentary and political. I agree. The parliamentary side involves the maintenance of order and, even more important, preservation of the dignity and honor of the House itself and the rights and privileges of the Members. All that can be accomplished by a fair and impartial discharge of the powers of the Speaker.

The political side, naturally, involves party service. I subscribe to the policies, platform, and principles of my party. I shall endeavor, so far as I properly can, to assist in the enactment of legislation in accordance with those principles and policies.

But I have been in a minority, too. I understand its problems. And while I help the majority carry out its plans, I shall be equally insistent upon preserving fully the right of the minority to debate and record openly its position on all public questions. [Applause.]

This session of Congress will be historically important. Yet I have no doubt that the House will measure up to the responsibility resting upon it.

The House is closer to the people and more responsive to their will than any other branch of our Government. Because it is so representative of the wishes of the people, we should see that it becomes a dominant factor in legislation. I shall, as your Speaker, devote my earnest efforts to that end. [Applause.]

We live in a progressive age. Time does not march backward. We must march forward with time. We have done so in the last few years. We must continue to do so if our country is to maintain its present proud place at the head of the nations of the world.

There doubtless will be times when some of us disagree as to the proper path. I feel sure, though, that finally we shall all head in the same direction and do so willingly without bitterness or recriminations.

I earnestly ask that you, my old friends with whom I have served so long, and you, my new friends who have helped me to this high position, join with me in preserving the dignity and prestige of the House to which I pledge myself. [Applause.]

I am now ready to take the oath of office, and I shall ask the distinguished dean of the House, Hon. A. J. SABATH, of Illinois, to administer the oath.

Mr. SABATH then administered the oath of office to the Speaker-elect.

SWEARING IN OF THE MEMBERS

The SPEAKER. Some years ago a precedent which had theretofore existed of having the oath administered to Members by States was discontinued and the precedent set whereby all Members took the oath of office at one and the same time. In order to avoid confusion the Chair thinks it best to follow the latter precedent, and the Chair asks each Member of the House and each Delegate to rise in his place while the Chair administers the oath of office.

The Members-elect and Delegates arose and the Speaker administered the oath of office.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS

The SPEAKER. The next business before the House is the election of officers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution for immediate consideration, as directed by the Democratic caucus.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 13

Resolved, That South Trimble, of the State of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That Kenneth Romney, of the State of Montana, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That Joseph J. Sinnott, of the State of Virginia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Finis E. Scott, of the State of Tennessee, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives; and

That Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., of the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Republican conference, I am directed to offer a substitute for the resolution just offered by the gentleman from Colorado, and upon that I ask for a division of the resolution just read in order that the name of the Reverend James Shera Montgomery as Chaplain may be voted upon separately.

I send the following resolution to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William Tyler Page, of the State of Maryland, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That Joseph G. Rodgers, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That Bert W. Kennedy, of the State of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Frank W. Collier, of the State of Wisconsin, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I did not submit a unanimous-consent request. I demanded a division of the question as a parliamentary right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought there would be no objection. The gentleman from New Jersey asked for a division of the resolution, and, of course, is entitled to it.

The question is on the election of Rev. James Shera Montgomery as Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The question was taken, and the Reverend James Shera Montgomery was elected Chaplain of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The substitute resolution was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. South Trimble, Mr. Kenneth Romney, Mr. Joseph J. Sinnott, Mr. Finis E. Scott, and the Reverend James Shera Montgomery, D. D., appeared at the bar of the House, and the oath of office was administered to them by the Speaker.

COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution for immediate consideration.

House Resolution 14

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I may say for the information of the House that the reason I am acting in this capacity is because our majority leader, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is ill and unable to be present today.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee:

The gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TAYLOR, the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DOUGHTON, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL.

NOTIFICATION OF THE SENATE OF THE ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

House Resolution 15

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, has been elected Speaker; that South Trimble, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, has been elected Clerk; and that the House is ready for business.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for immediate consideration.

House Resolution 16

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to inform the President of the United States that the House of Representatives has elected JOSEPH W. BYRNS, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, Speaker, and South Trimble, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, Clerk, of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION FOR THE HOUSE TO RECESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following unanimous-consent request and ask that it may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado presents the following unanimous-consent request:

"That notwithstanding the rules of the House, it may be in order during the balance of this week to move that the House take a recess."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 17

Resolved, That the rules of the Seventy-third Congress be, and they are hereby, adopted as the rules of the Seventy-fourth Congress, including therein the following amendment, to wit:

That the last sentence of the first paragraph of section 4 of rule XXVII be amended to read as follows:

"When a majority of the total Membership of the House shall have signed the motion, it shall be entered on the Journal, printed with the signatures thereto in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and referred to the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees."

Mr. RANSLEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. How much time will the gentleman be able to get along with—and I mean the very minimum?

Mr. RANSLEY. I would say 30 minutes. I want a division of time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] 30 minutes, but I want it understood that I yield no time for amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Will an opportunity be given to offer an amendment to this rule?

Mr. O'CONNOR. As far as I am concerned, no.

Mr. SNELL. We just wanted to know; that is all.

Mr. FISH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FISH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this is a parliamentary inquiry addressed to the Chair.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. This is addressed to the Chair. I would like to know whether an amendment will be in order?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield if the gentleman is going to attempt to upset the rules of the House. The gentleman cannot submit a parliamentary inquiry unless I yield to him for that purpose. I stated I would yield, but I want the gentleman to know that I am yielding to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from New York wants to know whether the Chair will recognize the gentleman to offer an amendment to this rule.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not ordered, the Chair will recognize any gentleman who has an amendment to offer which is germane.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House this is not the most pleasant duty which could evolve upon me on the opening day of the Seventy-fourth Congress, but by reason of my membership on the Rules Committee it is a duty I have to perform, and I do it with reluctance.

To some of you new Members I might state in advance that the Rules Committee is an arm of the leadership of this House. It is sometimes called an "arm" of the administration in power in the Nation. Some people have also referred to it as the "political committee", or the committee which shapes or brings before the House the policies of the leadership of the House and the administration.

I expect before this Congress is over we will hear a lot of talk about gag rules alleged to have been brought in by the Rules Committee. Of course, this particular resolution is not in that category. This is not a gag rule of any kind.

We are merely asking that the rules of the Seventy-third Congress be adopted as the rules of this Congress with one exception, for the moment, and that is in reference to the so-called "discharge rule." For years there has been a great deal of discussion about this discharge rule. To my mind too much emphasis has been laid on both sides of the question. In my own personal opinion too much importance is attached to it. Any time 145 men sincerely and honestly and without playing politics want consideration of a measure by this House they will get it, and I have never seen it to fail. The proponents of the change of the rule, so that it shall require a majority on a petition, feel that very often "the 145 rule" furnishes a method for political use or a means of putting the Membership "on the spot", as it is colloquially stated. When this rule was changed a few years ago that danger was observed by some Members at that time. Let us be fair about the matter. What is the history of this rule? A few Congresses ago there was a great urge throughout the Nation carried by some of the leading newspapers, particularly one chain of newspapers, that it should be made possible in the House of Representatives to get a vote on the prohibition question, either on a repeal resolution or on a beer bill. The demand grew up throughout the Nation, not from inside this House but from outside the House, that there should be a vote on both questions. There was a yielding to that demand in this House, and "the 145 rule" was passed. Substantially every Republican then opposed the rule. It was passed, however, frankly for the purpose of that vote, and, of course, its passage for that purpose accomplished nothing, because no repeal of the eighteenth amendment and no beer bill ever passed this House by reason of any petition lodged here, and no petition lodged here has ever been effective to make any one bill a law. As far as I recall, only one bill against which a petition was lodged ever passed this House even and went to the other body.

I know the possible reply to the historical explanation. Some people will say: "Well, some of you were very selfish when you advocated the "145 discharge rule" for certain purposes only." Incidentally, as I recall, everybody who favored prohibition voted against the enactment of the "145 discharge rule."

The Democratic Party in this House has 322 Members. I believe the minority will concede that the majority is entitled to function, and we claim the majority must function. The responsibility for the success of this Congress depends upon the majority. It depends upon the Democratic majority. It does not depend upon any 145 men on either or both sides. It depends upon the overwhelming majority of the Membership of this House, and it cannot function without the overwhelming majority of the Democrats of this House, which is easily more than 145.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. McFARLANE. If this change as proposed is made, does it not mean a bill has to be passed before it can even be considered, if a majority is required?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is not necessarily so. The discharge rule as it exists today and as it will exist if this change is adopted by the House provides that after the bill is in a committee and the committee has had 30 days to consider it, and the committee refuses to report, a petition may be lodged at the Clerk's desk to bring out the bill. Surely the House wants their committees to consider the numerous bills, and I do not believe there is a Member of this House who wants a bill to come to the House before a committee has had time to consider the bill.

I am sure no one can justly say that 30 days is too long a time to give a committee to consider a bill, with the enormous business that is before the committees.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am going to yield the gentleman 2 minutes. Cannot the gentleman make the statement in his own time?

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman has not been very generous in yielding me only 2 minutes, and for that reason I am trying to cut in now.

Under the proposed change, 218 Members are necessary before the House can consider a bill under this rule. Therefore, it means that a majority have actually voted to pass the bill before they can get it up for consideration, because we may assume that everybody who signs the petition will vote for it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me tell my good Democratic friend, who has a great deal of interest in many so-called "progressive" measures, for which I admire him, that whenever 145 Democrats honestly want consideration of a measure in this House I am sure they are going to get it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. How about the bonus bill? They did not get that until they got in a petition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman did not get the effect of my statement.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he means to state to the House that you have entirely changed your position in regard to the rule since you came into a majority in the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Like the gentleman himself.

Mr. SNELL. That statement is correct, is it not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Like the gentleman himself; yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did the gentleman take the position when he was in the minority in the House that the majority was entitled to function and that it ought to function?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am sure I took that position.

Mr. SNELL. But did the gentleman vote that way?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; no more than the gentleman himself voted that way.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I did. That is where the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the gentleman from New York was in the majority he was for the "218 rule"; and now, being in the minority, he is for the "145 rule."

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a brief question.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman states that when 145 Members——

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not state that.

Mr. TRUAX. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought the gentleman said that 145 Members, when they honestly wanted consideration of a bill, can get such consideration, and I would like to ask the gentleman how, if this rule is repealed or amended.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not state that, I may say to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. What did the gentleman state?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the morning [laughter]——

Mr. TRUAX. What did the gentleman state?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. For the information of the gentleman who just arose, the gentleman from New York stated that when 145 Democrats wanted the consideration of a bill, they would get it; but when a minority of 145 in the House wanted such consideration they should not have it; is not that correct?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I stand by my statement. [Laughter and applause.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of this House honestly believes that we can function better with a discharge rule which requires the signatures of 218 Members than the present discharge rule of 145 Members.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman believe that the number of 145 is really more democratic than 218?

Mr. O'CONNOR. One hundred and forty-five is one-third of the House as compared with a majority of the House. If there were 145 Members who, it could be shown to me, were really sincere in signing such a petition and were not trying to play politics or were not trying to endanger the safety of the election of Members, I would be for the "145 rule"; but I have lived with this rule for many years, and I know the sinister motives sometimes behind these petitions.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What is the gentleman's test for sincerity as to those who sign these petitions?

Mr. O'CONNOR. His party affiliation might have something to do with it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY PRESIDENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the committee that was appointed to wait upon the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed on the part of the House to join a committee on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, performed that duty. The President asked us to report that he will be pleased to deliver in person his message tomorrow, at 12:30 p. m., to a joint session of the two Houses.

JOINT SESSION

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. To offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Colorado for that purpose?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 1

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 4th day of January, 1935, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The resolution was agreed to.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer another resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Colorado for that purpose?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 18

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing committee of the House of Representatives on Ways and Means, to wit:

Robert L. Doughton, of North Carolina, chairman; Samuel B. Hill, of Washington; Thomas H. Cullen, of New York; Christopher D. Sullivan, of New York; Morgan G. Sanders, of Texas; John W. McCormack, of Massachusetts; David J. Lewis, of Maryland; Fred M. Vinson, of Kentucky; Jere Cooper, of Tennessee; John W. Boehne, Jr., of Indiana; Claude A. Fuller, of Arkansas; Wesley E. Disney, of Oklahoma; Arthur P. Lamneck, of Ohio; Frank H. Buck, of California; Richard M. Duncan, of Missouri; Chester Thompson, of Illinois; J. Twing Brooks, of Pennsylvania; and John D. Dingell, of Michigan.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE RULES

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] has 30 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes. I am opposed to any drastic change being made of the so-called "discharge rule." The rule as it stands today, requiring 145 of the membership of this House to sign on the dotted line so as to take from a committee a bill, has given to my mind general satisfaction.

It is now proposed to increase that number to 218, which means an absolute majority, not of the Members present when the matter is to be considered, but a majority of the Membership of the entire House.

I sincerely hope that the Members will vote this attempted violent change down, so that we can function under the so-called "145 discharge rule." If the House agrees to increase the number to 218, it will utterly destroy the recall rule, because we never will be able to operate under it. [Applause.]

I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have no misgivings as to the result of the resolution which is now pending. Yet I feel it is my duty to express my opposition at this time. I realize full well a Democratic caucus has made it Democratic doctrine to adopt an effective gag rule. The rights of the minority, which have prevailed for several years, are to be taken away, and the majority achieves its objects through brute strength. I believe it is complimentary to the Republicans of this House, who are outnumbered by 3 to 1, when the Democratic leadership comes here and through this rule, in effect, says drastic measures must be adopted so that the Republicans will not annoy us with our legislative program. Think of it, 102 being able to block the will of over 300. This to my mind is a reflection on the Democratic leadership. But, really, I believe, upon reflection, that perhaps, after all, the Democratic leadership is playing a little joke on its own membership. Under past conditions the discharge rule required 145 signatures. Obviously the Republicans could not exercise the rule, there being only 102 of us, unless there were a strong similar sentiment on the Democratic side of the aisle. So I am inclined to believe the leadership is really afraid of its ability to control its own membership. Those of you who are liberal Democrats might well think that over. The Chairman of the Committee on Rules himself, for whom I have the greatest respect and in whom I have the fullest confidence, stands here in this forum and says if he were not the Chairman of the Committee on Rules he would not be urging the resolution. Those of you who are independently minded, those of you who do not occupy such a high position, can properly join with us Republicans who want to see the rights of the minority protected and permit an opportunity for a fair consideration of legislation.

The distinguished Speaker, who has just been exalted to his high office—a man whom we Republicans hold in high esteem—admonishes you in his acceptance speech not to go backward. I say without hesitation we are taking a backward step today if we increase the number required to discharge the committee from 145 to 218. My Democratic friends, you may do this in a spirit of loyalty to your party; you may do it on the opening day when you are fresh from the election, and your Democracy is more uppermost than it will be in a few weeks, but I ask you to hesitate now and think well of the step that you are taking. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the time will come when a good many of you who are going to vote for this resolution today will wish many times you could recall the vote. So I appeal to all who are liberal and who believe in a square deal to express yourself in the opposition. You Democrats who have gone about the country in past campaigns and told the people the Democratic Party is the liberal party should realize now is the time, here is the moment, for you to demonstrate your loyalty to liberalness and vote down this previous question. If we can vote down the previous question, then we will offer an amendment reducing the number to 145 and will have retained a liberal rule. The call is for those who, perhaps, being liberals, should demonstrate liberalness in their vote.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman would not have to vote down the previous question to reduce the number to 145, because it will remain at 145.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I accept the correction of the gentleman. I have not seen the resolution because we have made a departure here today in bringing in a change in the rules without the committee's having an opportunity to consider the change.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman knows that the custom of this Congress is, on the first day for some individual Member, usually a member of the Committee on Rules, to offer a resolution just as I have today.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 1 minute more.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman understands thoroughly that on the opening day of the session of Congress we ordinarily adopt the rules of the preceding Congress. If there are to be any amendments, we consider them in due form as the session proceeds. That has been the custom in the past, and it ought to be the custom now. I am sorry that the progressive Democrat from New York, who has always been for progressive legislation——

Mr. O'CONNOR. And who still is——

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Should come here now and take what is certainly a backward step.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman can find precedents where, on the first day of Congress, such a motion as I have offered prevailed and certain amendments to the rules were adopted. I think this is one of the most progressive movements that can be made.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not believe that the gentleman really thinks that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who favored a discharge rule of 145 signatures until I saw it in action and saw that its chief purpose was to clog the program without obtaining results. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] seems to be somewhat distressed about the rights of the minority. After all, legislative bodies like this proceed with the power of the majority. There never has been such a task laid before a majority party as the task that was inherited at the beginning of this administration from the former administration, in the way of a legislative program. The present administration has developed speed in the enactment of legislation to take care of this difficult situation. We feel that all of these barriers, all of these obstacles that can be thrown in the way, merely delay without having any adequate or valuable results.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman said that the only effect of this "145 rule" has been to delay. I wish the gentleman would give a specific instance of that, because I am not aware of any such result.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It serves to bring out, without due consideration by a committee, legislation which in no way has been perfected; and it has been my information, and I think I am correct in that, that not a single one of these bills that have been brought out by any motion signed by 145 has become a law.

Mr. McFARLANE. How about the liquor question?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That did not become a law when it was brought out under the motion to discharge. It became a law at a later date.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It became a law because the issue was forced to the floor after the committee had stifled it for years.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Oh, it was forced to an issue in this House by the country and not by the discharge rule at all.

Mr. KELLER. What about the Patman bill in regard to the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not remember just exactly how that came up; but I think if the gentleman will consult the RECORD, he will find that it did not reach a favorable result on that petition.

Mr. KELLER. We voted on it and passed it by a huge majority in this House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There is no desire on the part of the House or the majority to delay legislation, but the desire is for it to be considered in the proper way by a committee. Generally, bills that come out are of a peculiar character that appeal to some particular group. By signing that petition and bringing pressure from back home upon the Members, they hope to get results prematurely. I am in favor of following the historical method of letting the committee give full consideration to every bill and then bring it out with either its approval or disapproval, so that the House can consider it in that manner.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The Member who is interested in filing a petition always waits until the committee has had the bill before it for 30 days. It took 5 months to get the Patman bill on the floor of this House, even with the 145-signature provision.

Mr. GREENWOOD. With the volume of business we have today, 30 days is not a proper length of time for a committee to consider a particular bill which this gentleman or that gentleman or some other gentleman may have a particular desire to be enacted.

Mr. CONNERY. It is the hearings that are asked. When hearings are refused, that is when a Member files a petition. Nobody ever rushed a committee without asking the committee to hold hearings. They wait until the committee refuses to hold hearings.

Mr. GREENWOOD. We understand that procedure, and this amendment will change it from 145 to 218, a majority; and I believe in the majority having control at all times, but I do not believe in 145 forcing action upon the majority.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. As a matter of fact, if the rule would require 218 signatures, there must be a majority of this House already convinced of the righteousness of a bill before that bill can be brought to the floor of the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman assumes that because a Member signs a petition, therefore he favors the bill to which the petition refers in the particular form in which it is to come out. As a matter of fact, he might sign a petition forcing consideration of a particular bill because he wanted to vote against it. At least, let us have a majority sign the petition whether they are for it or against it. Then let the House, after a majority have signed such petition, consider the bill on its merits.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The discharge rule goes to the initiation. It does not go to clogging or affecting the majority processes in the House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Initiation; but the majority is left to consider it. I am in favor of the majority having the power to initiate, and not the minority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] has again expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, certainly the proposed amendment of the discharge rule is not for the purpose of having committees give due and thorough consideration to legislation, because in the last Congress some of the most important bills were passed without consideration by any committee, and with a typewritten bill and two carbon copies present in the House this was all the House had to consider before it voted on its final passage. So that argument that it is to give an opportunity for due and deliberate consideration is out.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. What opportunity will the Membership have to vote on certain measures that they are pledged to vote on but which will not be permitted to be brought to the floor of this House if the number required to discharge a committee is increased to 218?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There will be no opportunity. I have no intention of discussing the merits of the majority rule or the "145 rule." What I wish to say, in the few brief moments allotted to me, is to point out the significance of this amendment that is proposed at this time to be adopted under this procedure, which is without precedent, on the first day of the session, and before a Rules Committee has been elected. It has been the invariable procedure to adopt the rules of the last Congress; and if changes were to be made, they were reported subsequently by the Rules Committee when organized. Never has a rule of any importance ever been amended in this fashion.

The Republicans have 102 Members in this House. Therefore, the "145 rule" is not sought to be abrogated in order to protect anybody against the machinations of the Republicans. The purpose of the rule is directed to the Democratic membership of this House. For weeks the papers throughout the country have discussed the question, Will this new Congress, with an overwhelming Democratic majority, do as its leaders tell it? It has been intimated that the majority would do as it was told in every particular, because it was said in the papers that the majority would be ridden with choke bit, whip, and spur. The very first step in order to make that possible, in order to make the individual members of the majority amenable to such riding, is to ask you to take away the chance on your own motion to inaugurate consideration of any bit of legislation. Now you are about to show the country that you are going to do in every respect just exactly what you are told.

You are going to make it possible that the leaders may enforce your obedience to every command they issue by voting away your own right to protect yourself. Now, go ahead and do it. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, after his long and memorable fight, extending over a period of 20 years, to amend the rules of the House, when success came to his efforts, John Quincy Adams recorded in his diary:

Blessed, oh, blessed be this day.

I wish to congratulate the new leadership that has been set up in this body today upon taking this proposition in hand and wiping out of the rules something that ought never to have been there. It has been used as a weapon to club and to sandbag and to beat on the head and to intimidate Members of this House. It has been an abomination. It stands as an ever-present and constant threat to constituted leadership and to party responsibility.

We are going to repeal it today, I may say to my friend the gentleman from New Jersey, who just preceded me, not through the might of any powerful majority, but we are going to repeal it because we Democrats have made up our minds to return to orderly procedure and to proper functioning of a party majority. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this proposed rule violates the very essence and cornerstone of liberalism. Liberalism means the right to govern yourself, to think, to act, and to vote for yourself as an elected Representative of the people back home. There are any number of Democrats who pledged themselves in the last election and the election prior to that to vote to reform and liberalize the rules so that legislation could be brought upon the floor and considered on its merits by the Members.

As Al Smith says, "Let us look at the record." The record will be made this afternoon whether the Democratic Party actually stands for liberalism and believes in permitting the consideration of important bills through a workable discharge rule to which many Members have pledged themselves to their electorate or whether the Rules Committee is to become the master of the House. And I say to the Republicans, the Republican record for liberalism likewise will be made this afternoon. There has been a great deal of talk to the effect that the Republican Party should liberalize and humanize its policies. Some people have said that this should be done by the National Committee. The record of the Republican Party will be formulated and shaped and made by the votes of the Republican Members of the House of Representatives and of the Republican Senators at the other end of the Capitol, and not by any members of the National Committee. The responsibility is ours, and we cannot shirk it. For good or bad, the test begins today. We must stand for liberalism or against it. The final record will speak for itself. The Democrats propose by this rule to take from the Members of the House the right to legislate—the very right, the very reason, for which they were sent to this body by their constituents. You propose by your own vote—and everybody knows how the vote is going to come out—you propose to say to your constituents that you are not competent or able to legislate on the floor of the House of Representatives; that you will from now on be rubber stamps; and that you will jump through the hoop at the crack of the lash of the Postmaster General, or of the "brain trust", or of anyone else who assumes to speak for the President.

The question before the House is not merely that of the rules of the House, but the real question before the House is that of the restoration of our representative form of government; nothing less and nothing more.

No wonder the members of the Rules Committee from the Democratic side of the House want the new Members, the liberal-minded Democrats, to vote for this rule, which turns the actual legislative power over to the Rules Committee. When the proposed rule is adopted, you might as well write above the door of the Committee on Rules, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." You are abdicating your powers to a hard-boiled Rules Committee, and you do not seem to know what you are doing, and then it will be too late. Already we as a Congress have gone too far in abdicating our powers and surrendering our privileges to the Chief Executive. [Applause.] In spite of the advice of the Speaker that we must march forward with the times, you propose to write into the rules of this House a reactionary proposal, an unworkable rule, a fraudulent measure, a political trick which every older Member knows it to be. Its purpose is to prevent liberal Republicans and Democrats from carrying out their pledges to pass adequate old-age pension legislation, unemployment insurance, and other social-reform measures. It will be completely unworkable, and it will not be used once in the coming session of Congress. I ask you to vote down this resolution, in order to restore representative government in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, this rule was adopted by the House during the Seventy-second Congress. I recall that during the early days of that session I made my first acquaintance with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. I was very pleased at that time to see that he was using this particular discharge rule for the purpose of furthering the so-called "Hull-O'Connor beer bill." At that time it served a good purpose. It has served a good purpose since then in bringing onto the floor of the House liberal and progressive legislation, legislation of national importance, legislation that has been advocated by a large percentage of the people of this country. I do not recall of one instance during the last two Congresses during which time this rule has been in effect, that after the 145 names have been signed to the petition the bill failed to receive the approval of a majority of the Members of the House. I believe this shows conclusively that unless we have a discharge rule which permits of the bringing of a bill onto the floor of the House by 145 Members that we will be unable to get consideration of legislation even though a majority of the Members of the House approve it, for it is one thing to get votes, but quite another thing to get signatures.

Gentlemen have said that this rule has been used to put Members on the spot. I maintain that there is no Member of this House who should not be willing to express his views by his recorded vote. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, with a word of history let me couple a word of warning. A little more than 3 years ago all the Members who are now sitting here on my right and who were then Members of Congress voted to liberalize the rules by changing the requirements of the discharge rule from a majority to 145 Members. Their minds are not so short that they have forgotten that fact in the time which has since elapsed. Various things, however, have occurred in the meanwhile. The majority party has found that it has been very much bothered by the discharge rule, but not by those on the other side of the aisle. The chief trouble which the majority party has suffered under the present discharge rule was caused by their very own Members. On repeated occasions they have freed the hands of their own leaders and discharged committees which they controlled overwhelmingly.

So much for the word of history, and now for the word of warning. It has been stated generally that a movement is on foot to fill the committees with large numbers of the majority party and to cut down the minority to a very small representation. Does it not occur to those in power in the majority party that they might again find a danger in numbers? That they will frequently be embarrassed by Members of their own party because of their overrepresentation on various committees?

Might I not in the short time allotted to me suggest to those who are now in control that they ask themselves whether, before the present Congress has finished its sessions, they may not need the help of the other side of the aisle to cooperate in enacting sound legislation or in controlling dangerous measures? You have the power to take away a large part, even all, of our committee assignments, but experience has usually proved that it does not pay to be too grasping. Cooperation in committee work is to be desired. Is it wise to fail to take advantage of the experience and ability of the members of the minority party? Short-sightedness now may lead to disaster later.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I think the only point in changing this rule from 145 to 218 is that the great masses of the American people who want labor legislation, who want to see the soldiers' bonus paid, and who want to see employment insurance are going to be blocked in their effort to get this legislation through the present Congress. [Applause.] There is no need fooling ourselves on this side. With 102 Republicans and a majority of 300 on the Democratic side there is no question of majority rule. The only result of the passage of this resolution changing the rule from 145 to 218 names will be that progressive legislation on the Democratic side will be hamstrung, and Democratic Members are going to be prevented from getting that legislation through.

It would be much easier for anyone who has been here any length of time, as I have been, to vote for the "218 rule" because that means that all you need to do is to come on the floor of the House and sign on the dotted line when the leaders and the Rules Committee tell you what you may do and what you may not do. However, I am one of those who does not believe that that is representative government by the American people. [Applause.] I do not believe that your George Washingtons, your Patrick Henrys, your Samuel Adamses, your Thomas Jeffersons, and the writers of the Constitution of the United States intended that the Congress, which the Speaker referred to as the "greatest legislative body in the world", should be under the domination of 1, 2, 3, 4, or 5 men. That is why they defeated the rule of Cannonism. This amendment here today is an approach back to the days of Cannonism.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. I wonder if our leaders can explain why it was in the Seventy-second Congress they were advocating the adoption of the "145 names rule" that they now ask to be repealed?

Mr. CONNERY. That is a question for themselves to answer.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is a political question.

Mr. CONNERY. The very distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] 12 years ago gave on the floor of this House one of the most wonderful arguments in favor of the "145 rule" I have ever heard, and his whole argument was predicated on the premise that no chairman should be allowed to put a bill in his pocket and leave it there and no committee of the Congress of the United States should be allowed to stifle legislation when the country was clamoring for legislation beneficial to the great masses of the American people.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In reference to putting bills in pockets and committees not functioning, may I say those matters were taken care of at that time by other amendments to the rule.

Mr. CONNERY. By the Longworth decision saying that a committee could force its chairman to call a meeting?

Mr. O'CONNOR. And the other rule allowing the privilege to a member of the Rules Committee to call up a rule if the chairman would not do so. Those amendments take care of the phases involved and have nothing to do with this discharge rule.

Mr. CONNERY. May I say to the distinguished gentleman from New York that theoretically the idea is beautiful that 218, a majority of the House, may do anything they want to do. As I say, theoretically it is beautiful, but practically we know what happened to the soldiers' bonus when it took 5 months to get it on the floor of the House even under the "145 rule." We know what happened under the gag rules brought in by the Rules Committee, on divisions of the House, and all the parliamentary tricks that were used to stifle the wishes of the American people.

The gentleman from New York talks about being put on the spot. You do not have to be put on the spot, and, furthermore, I think every Member of Congress should be willing to be put on the spot at any time; he should be willing to let his constituents know by roll-call votes, petitions, or otherwise just how he feels and votes on any legislation.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield me one-half minute?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts an additional half minute.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to take the half minute to say that under the rules those who are opposed to changing this rule—those who favor the "145 rule"—will vote down the previous question on the resolution before us, because that then leaves the matter open to amendment and we can go back to the "145 rule" and protect the rights of the people.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I should dislike to have anyone arrive at an estimate of the character of the House of Representatives from a study of the history of this discharge rule alone. The action of the House on it has been characterized by an utter lack of principle and an attempt to take advantage of the political exigencies as they were thought to exist at the time. Those who have read the history of the discharge rule know that it was originally adopted in 1910 for the purpose of taking away from the Speaker some of his power to recognize the individual Members of the House of Representatives to bring up legislation as he saw fit and to prevent the Members from bringing up any legislation that he did not want to have brought up. The rule as originally adopted authorized any Member to file a discharge motion, have the motion put on the Discharge Calendar, and then to bring it up on suspension days.

The Member who had filed the motion was permitted, upon suspension days, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill, provided his motion received a second by a majority of the House. As originally provided in the rule, this motion was in order on discharge days before the Speaker was allowed to recognize Members to move to suspend the rules.

The rule was adopted originally in a Republican Congress, but it received almost the unanimous support of both sides of the aisle. Later, when the Democrats came into power, in 1912, the rule was changed so as to permit the Speaker to recognize Members to move to suspend the rules before he was required to recognize anyone to move to discharge a committee, which had the effect, as a matter of fact, of preventing absolutely the recognition or right of a Member to move to discharge a committee. This was in a Democratic House. I was here several years under that rule and never saw a Member recognized by the Speaker to move to discharge a committee because he saw to it that enough Members were recognized to suspend the rules to consume all the time on suspension days, and when the time had been consumed a motion to adjourn was made by the majority leader and carried by the majority party.

Then, later, the rule was amended to permit a vote upon the motion to discharge a committee upon the signing of a petition by 150 Members and still later the rule was amended to require 218 Members to sign the petition before the discharge motion could be voted upon, the same as is proposed here today, and 3 years ago, upon the urge of people who wanted to vote upon the prohibition question, the rule was changed to 145.

It is probably fair to say that neither party in the House of Representatives has been consistent in its attitude toward the rule. Both parties are equally at fault in this respect, but it is safe to assume that this amendment is not brought up at this time for the purpose of protecting the minority party in the House. It is really a confession of a lack of confidence by the majority in itself. It is not proposed in order to protect the majority party against the minority party. There are only 102 Members on this side of the aisle and there are over 300 on that side. The purpose, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] has well pointed out, is to prevent consideration by this Congress of certain legislation relating to unemployment, to limitation of hours of labor, to old-age pensions, and of the Lemke bill and other bills of that nature. There is no need of anybody fooling himself. Its purpose is directly contrary to the sentiment quoted by our distinguished Speaker this morning from the statement of a former distinguished Republican Speaker, wherein he said that it was the right of the minority to record itself openly at all times on important matters, and it is not a very long step from a denial of the right to vote to a denial of the freedom of speech.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Shortly after election the press announced that one of the first things the majority would do would be to bring in a new rule requiring 218 signatures on a motion to discharge a committee in order to prevent action on the Frazier bill, the Lemke bill, and several other measures that the majority of the House Membership is in favor of having considered in this Congress.

Mr. MAPES. There is not any question about the purpose. Of course, like all law, parliamentary rules are for the purpose of protecting the minority and for giving the minority an opportunity to express itself, and the majority in this body intends, on the first day of the session, to change this rule back to a number which will prevent the minority from having an opportunity to express itself upon any important legislation by a vote of the House, and puts the control of legislation and of the House back exactly where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] said it would be put—in the hands of the Speaker and two or three other members of the majority party who occupy key positions on that side of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I only got a very short time from the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], whose own argument was not very enthusiastic for this particular change. The only thing I can do is to recall the words that the "Old Guard dies but never surrenders."

Two years ago we defeated an attempt to change this rule. When the number under this rule was originally reduced, it was reduced by Democrats to 145 for the purpose of liberalizing the rules of the House so that progressive legislation, stifled in the committee, could get to the floor. Now, as Democrats, are we going to step backward on a proposition that we have supported for more than three sessions of Congress?

I want to read what a distinguished Member of this House, the dean of the House, said in the Seventy-second Congress—and I am referring to the Honorable A. J. SABATH, of Illinois—when he spoke in favor of reducing this rule to its present number of 145 Members:

> After 22 years, thanks to the Democratic majority, we again have a chance and an opportunity to liberalize the rules and to relieve the Membership from the extremely restrictive and established rulings which have been in effect the last 10 years of Republican rule.

We are going to give the country a real laugh when we tell them that we have to gag ourselves because we are afraid of a little minority over there of 102 Members. We cannot get away with it, because it is nothing but buck passing, and there is not a new Member in this House who can go back home and explain to his constituents, "I voted to give away all my power to the committees and the reason I could not pass the bill I promised you I would fight for is because I gagged myself by voting to destroy the liberal discharge rule put into effect by the great Democratic liberals of past Congresses." [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to this amendment of the rule. The Democrats have fought to secure this rule, and if there is anything that is dear to the hearts of the organized groups of this country, organized labor, organized veterans, organized farmers, it is this vehicle for getting before the House legislation for consideration.

When I came to Congress I imagined that the executive branch of the Government exercised 1 veto power over the legislative branch, but when I got here I found there were 3. The first is that a bill referred to the committee is sent down to some department of the executive branch for a report. If they report adversely, it is not considered by the committee. Then I found that the bill has to pass the Rules Committee, and if the Rules Committee refuses to approve it, your bill is dead. If you are fortunate enough to get through these committees and get your bill passed by Congress, the President still has the power to veto the measure and nullify the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to changing this rule on which our people must rely in many cases to get constructive legislation considered by the Members of the House. [Applause.]

Mr O.'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am opposed to changing this rule from 145 to 218, because I want it to be understood that I am a real Democrat, and being Democratic, I am opposed to this change. What I mean by being a real Democrat is a person who, regardless of his party affiliation, will vote for legislation which he believes to be progressive and humane. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I understand that I am obligated to vote for the amendment to the rule which I have offered unless I made definite specific pledges in my campaign that I was against such an amendment to the rules. That is the one thing, as I understand, that would excuse me from voting for the amendment. I now move the previous question.

Mr. CONNERY and Mr. KELLER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, there is some confusion in regard to this vote. We are voting on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. Those who are in favor of the "145 rule" vote "no" on this vote?

The SPEAKER. That is not a proper parliamentary inquiry. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is parliamentary to state that this motion for the previous question is made by our acting Democratic floor leader.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is proper, either. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 245, nays 170, not voting 11, as follows:

Mr. Kelly with Mr. O'Leary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BYRNS, and he answered "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I was temporarily absent from the Chamber when the oath of office was administered. I desire to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. If there is any other Member who has not taken the oath of office, he will please step forward.

Mr. FOCHT and Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 1

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

In compliance with the foregoing the Vice President appointed Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. MCNARY as members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives.

Senate Resolution 2

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) providing for a joint session of the two Houses of Congress on Friday, January 4, 1935, to receive a message from the President of the United States.

PUBLIC HEARINGS—COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to make a little statement to the Members of this House. I want to give notice that the departmental hearings on the independent offices appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the Treasury and Post Office Department appropriation bill, and the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments bill have been completed. The committee will proceed to mark up those bills as soon as we are given a legal standing by the House as a committee. Therefore, if any gentleman upon the floor of this House desires to appear before any of those committees to present any viewpoint which he desires on appropriations for these regular activities, I am giving notice that you must do that between now and next Tuesday. Otherwise the bills will be reported to the House, the independent offices appropriation bill may be reported on Monday, so that hereafter no Member can claim that he has not had an opportunity to be heard before this committee or the subcommittees in charge of the bills. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, on next Monday, after matters on the Speaker's table are disposed of and the Budget message read, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]?

There was no objection.

COTTON

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have written to a constituent of mine upon the important subject of the cotton industry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter written by me to a constituent upon the important subject of the cotton industry.

HOUSTON, TEX., December 13, 1934.

Mr. W. T. NEBLETT,
Anderson, Tex.

DEAR MR. NEBLETT: Referring to your letter to me on the important subject of cotton, in which you discuss the effect of the A. A. A. and the Bankhead bill upon the welfare of yourself as a cotton farmer and its effect upon small cotton farmers and also upon tenant farmers, and in which you give a statement of facts and of your views generally on that subject:

I replied, briefly acknowledging your letter, and now take the time to reply at some greater length. Of course, I realize that that is the most vast problem affecting the cotton-producing States; and, therefore, that within the compass of a letter no satisfactory statement, analysis, argument, or conclusion can be made. I also realize that when the word "cotton" is used anywhere in the South one can start an argument at any time, because no two cotton farmers agree and no two persons in any branch of the cotton industry agree as to what is best to be done either by persons of one group or of all groups or by the Government concerning cotton; and, therefore, that even if a public man should be wise enough to understand this mighty problem in all its branches, and courageous enough to state his program, and fortunate enough to put a wise program through, there would still be multitudes who would differ and argue and criticize. Such is the very nature of public matters as well as of private concerns. And I sometimes think that is best, because it compels people to think and to act. Where public discussion is active, there is a chance of progress and the correction of public and private evils; but where there is universal acquiescence, there is generally stagnation. It is in this spirit, and recognizing these facts, that I try to find the truth and assert it and act on it and live by it; and it is in that spirit that I now write to you.

(1) When President Roosevelt assumed the Presidency on March 4, 1933, what was the actual condition of the cotton farmers in the Cotton Belt? They were entirely broke financially and utterly discouraged in their hearts. The price of cotton to the producer was about 5½ cents a pound. There was a very heavy carry-over, and they were preparing to plant an extra large acreage in 1933, and, of course, the effect would have been a vast crop at so poor a price as hardly to justify the picking. They were all in debt for their accounts, for their taxes, and nearly all in debt for interest on debts against their farms, and most of them had past-due notes on their farms. It was a perfect picture of despair. Persons in private and in business relations had so conducted the cotton business that it had brought the ruination of the producers. That meant that unless the Congress of the United States, backed by the President, were able and willing to devise a plan to aid the cotton producer, he was ruined, in turn the South was ruined, and in turn the Nation could not get out of that awful depression.

(2) The first thing the Congress did was to come to the aid of the bankers. Congress met on March 9, 1933, and on March 9 we made nearly all paper in national banks eligible for rediscounts, so as to give them the power to take notes in their vaults down to the Federal Reserve banks and bring back Federal Reserve bank notes in their place, and in that way we made the banks safe. We later had the Reconstruction Finance Corporation buy much of their long-time paper, and later their preferred stock, and later we guaranteed the public their deposits in the banks, so that taken altogether we first and foremost saved the banks from ruin and collapse, knowing if they were entirely ruined the country would be entirely ruined. In the same way we saved the building and loan associations. In the same way we saved many of the great railroad companies. In the same way we saved the trust companies. In the same way we saved the insurance companies. The tariff laws already, in effect, saved the manufacturers from competition against the rest of the world, and we aided big business in all proper ways so that there would not be a complete break-down of the American system of business. And every bit of that had directly the effect of putting the wealth and resources and earning power of all of the American people back of those big interests so as to help sustain them from complete collapse.

(3) Then the Congress and the administration turned their attention, for the first time since this Nation was established, to the work of saving the producers from total collapse, after they had already been ruined by Hoover's "rugged individualism." It turned out to be "ragged individualism." We knew that the producers bear the burden of feeding and clothing the Nation, and that they fight the Nation's battles in time of war and they support the Nation in time of peace. Aside from humanitarian sentiments, mere common sense dictated that if the producer could not protect and save himself, at least his Government ought to devise plans to restore him and his business to normal condition if possible and as soon as possible. Thus the A. A. A. Act was passed. It was conceived in haste, written in haste, debated in haste, passed in haste, and administered in haste. Naturally it was and is imperfect. But when a Nation has been for 12 long years hastening to the precipice of ruin, do people expect, in the midst of that kind of a stress and strain, with a great many almost equally important subjects pressing and demanding attention, that a Congress of men mostly new to the work, elected in a political revolution, to be 100 percent perfect in their work? If so, they expect more than they themselves could perform under similar conditions. We did the best we could. We had a thousand differences to compose. We had sectional antagonisms. We had class distinctions and enmities. We had political bitter fights. We had no united backing in our several constituencies for any one of us on any question that came up. The Nation was in such sore distress and in such spirit of revolt that it could not unite by public opinion back of any suggestion or plan any statesman devised. I make this outline merely that you may know the conditions that have confronted Congress in the enactment of the A. A. A. and the Bankhead bill.

(4) The device adopted by the A. A. A. was for the voluntary limitation of the cotton yield for 1933. This was accomplished by the payment of rentals to prevent planting, by payments for plow-up of quantities already planted, and by inducing the price to be fixed at around 12 cents per pound by action of the Government in first lending 10 cents and later 12 cents per pound on the crop of 1933. The net result of such law and its administration was to raise the price to the producer from about 5½ cents to about 12 cents per pound. For the first time since the depression began, the cotton farmer could pay his accounts, his taxes, his notes at the bank, the interest on his land notes, and some or most of the notes due on his land, and hold up his head, because hope had come into his heart. Naturally, in a law and its administration affecting 2,000,000 cotton farmers in the South, some were injured and displeased, while the great multitude were benefited and pleased.

(5) Then came along the year 1934. I am writing this letter from memory and without notes or data; but I think I am accurate when I say that to make the crop in 1933, a total of 3,000 units (tons, I think) of fertilizers were purchased and used. But the farmers of the South were so pleased with 12-cent cotton that they made up their minds to make a real crop in 1934, and therefore by February 1934 had actually ordered 175,000 such units of fertilizers. Of course, that was mostly States other than Texas, because our lands are richer. But we in Congress knew from reports all over the South that there would likely be 40,000,000 acres planted in the year 1934 and the production vastly increased by the Southeastern States farmers having bought nearly 60 times as much fertilizer as the year before. We in Congress knew that under those conditions, considering the carry-over from 1933 and the increase in acreage planted planned by the farmers in 1934 and the additional fertilization that there would be such a vast crop at the end of the growing season in 1934 that it would not be worth picking, with the result that our Texas cotton farmers of every class would sink even deeper into despair than they were on March 4, 1933, when we took hold to try to help all of the American people.

(6) Under these conditions the Bankhead bill was conceived and prepared, reported favorably by committee, passed through the House and Senate, and approved by the President. While the A. A. A. contemplated a voluntary reduction of output for 1933, we had come to realize that that program alone would not work for the year 1934, for the reasons above stated; and therefore it was a question of whether to do nothing more and watch the ruin of the South and then try to help a wrecked condition by donations and gratuities, or whether to try to help our cotton producers save themselves by taxing all cotton raised in excess of 10,400,000 bales, which would be about the right amount, considering the carry-over and considering domestic consumption and usual foreign demand so as to go out of the cotton season of 1934–35 with a final carry-over not too heavy to break prices for the 1935 crop.

(7) Neither I, as your Representative, nor, as I believe, any other Congressman from the South, thought of the A. A. A. or of the Bankhead bill as a permanent legislative policy and program but only as an emergency policy and program because of the terrible conditions and awful emergency confronting the cotton producer and everybody else in Texas and the rest of the South and the rest of the country. Indeed, in the very body of the Bankhead bill we put a limitation on its life; and, for the first time I know of in legislative history, provided a sort of referendum so that two-thirds of the cotton producers must approve it before it is carried forward again. Even, however, if all cotton producers approve it, it dies by the very terms of the bill itself in the early future. Bear in mind, therefore, that it is not what is properly called permanent legislation. That is a matter yet in the future and yet to be determined and enacted, or not enacted, by Congress.

carry-over from 1933 and added to the diminishing export market, it would have rendered the price so low as hardly to justify the picking; and (b) by ginners who would like to gin more at so much per bale, by the transportation agencies which would like to haul more at so much per bale, by the compressors which would like to compress more at so much per bale, by the warehouses that would like to warehouse more at so much per bale, and by the cotton merchants whose foreign markets have been greatly crippled because our Government, by the above laws and policies, has pegged this year's price at around 14 cents, which makes it impossible for them successfully to compete with cheaper cotton raised elsewhere in the world and offered successfully in competition in the cotton-purchasing centers of the world, as well as also the innumerable laborers, employees, and clerks threatened with loss of employment by continuance of the program of 1933 and 1934.

(9) Mr. Neblett, there is not just one class of people to be considered when Government tries to help the cotton producer. It is indispensably necessary to that producer that these other agencies above mentioned are allowed to live and make a fair profit in order to purchase this cotton from the producer and move it to ultimate market. The ginner is indispensable, and so also are the transportations to port and to mill in the United States, and so also are the compressors and the warehousemen, and so also are the cotton merchants and all those they employ. All alike are in the same boat and are engaged in the noblest enterprise this glorious land we call the South can possibly engage in. We must not sacrifice the farmers, and neither must we sacrifice any of these other agencies, because each alike is necessary to the other, and all alike are necessary to Texas, to the South, and to the entire country. This cotton crop in the South is a monopoly of soil and climate. Nowhere else in the world do soil and climate conspire to make a perfect fiber, one of the indispensable necessities of modern civilization. It is the cash crop of 2,000,000 farmers, and on their shoulders rides the population of the entire South. It has been that way for 75 or more years. Every other enterprise in America is organized and has common understandings and working agreements and production quotas except alone the cotton farmers. He is 2,000,000 strong and scattered in every country hamlet in a territory 2,000 miles long and 400 or 500 miles broad. He cannot organize. He has tried and failed. It is impossible. Unless Government steps in and helps him, he is destined to be the "hewer of wood and drawer of water" to the end of time, while producing a fiber indispensably necessary to mankind and the handling of which creates literally billions of value and profit. For the first time since this Government was established, it undertook by the A. A. A. in 1933 and the Bankhead bill in 1934 to do for the producer what the same Government has always been doing for the manufacturer. For what the farmer buys last year and this year he pays the same price he did when his cotton was 21 cents a pound. Why? Because the manufacturers of what he buys are few in number and agree to limit output to suit market, whereas the farmers are so many and so scattered that he cannot agree and limit his output to suit market. The result is he overproduces. The cheaper the price, the more he produces to get volume at small price to make enough for accounts, interest, taxes, etc. It is a hopeless situation unless the Government takes the same forethought for the producer of cotton that it takes for the manufacturer through tariff and by the other forms of benefits mentioned in the early part of this letter.

(10) Never again should the hand of Government be taken from under the cotton producer and him turned loose without suitable Government aid to overproduce and compete with himself and glut the market and so wreck himself and remain in poverty, while others who have fattened off him in the past make all the profits out of the crop he produces. Always the Congress have given to the manufacturers of cotton goods in this country a tariff to protect them from the competition of foreign manufacturers of the same raw product who could make it cheaper with cheaper labor; and if we are to continue that protection to the manufacturer, it is nothing but right that the section which produces cotton should have a compensating benefit. Then the blessing of this best national asset will be distributed justly and make for universal prosperity, instead of continuing to center all the wealth up North and East.

(11) No man ever lived who has, his whole life and now, believed more than I in the right of each person to personal liberty of conduct and of vocation, and therefore nothing but this depression emergency and the above sort of reflections could have induced me to aid, as I did, in the passage of the A. A. A. Act and in the framing and presenting and passage of the Bankhead bill. But I am glad I did it. Its benefits are already manifest in every community in the South.

(12) However, while we must retain those advantages to the producer secured by the above process, we must correct the injustices inflicted upon the other classes engaged in the cotton business. The serious question is, How can that be done? As I have intended ever since the summer of 1934, when I matured my own thought about it, I now intend to try with all my energy to secure the adoption by Congress at the forthcoming session of a plan to pay a bounty to the producer for each pound of cotton he raises that is manufactured and sold in the American market and turn him loose free to raise as much or as little as he may desire over and above that amount, without taxation or interference of any sort, this latter portion to be sold by him at the price of the world market.

Briefly to explain this proposal, let me say that the American demand is about 6,000,000 bales per year. The Government guaranteeing what is known as the parity price for that 6,000,000-bale portion of the annual crop, it would have the effect of pegging at about 16 or 17 cents the price of that 6,000,000 bales. Then the cotton producer can raise no more if that is his wish; but if he wishes to raise more, let him raise any amount he wants to, but that will not be pegged at any price by the Government but will be sold at the world price. By the term "parity price" is meant this: Taking the years 1909 to the outbreak of the war in 1914 as a basis, when the price the farmer received per pound for his cotton was fair when considered in relation to what he paid for what he had to purchase, then they take into consideration what are now the prices of what he must buy and they raise his sales price of cotton up, so that a pound of his cotton will buy for his family as much now as a pound of his cotton would have bought for what he needed in the years 1909–14. Under this plan if, therefore, the farmer should raise a 15,000,000-bale crop, 6,000,000 bales of that he would get parity price or around 16 or 17 cents. If the world market was as much as 16 or 17 cents, then the Government would lose nothing; but if the world price that year were, say, 9 cents, then the United States Treasury would pay the producer 8 or 9 cents per pound on that portion of his crop domestically consumed. The rest of the crop above such 6,000,000 bales that he may choose to produce in perfect freedom from restraint or taxation of any kind by the Government would be sold on the world market at whatever it would bring, and that would be so much extra profit and benefit to the producer and everybody else down the line. That would restore full prosperity to the cotton picker, to the cotton farmer, to the ginners, to the transportation agencies, to the compressors, to the warehousemen, to the cotton merchants and their employees, to the shipping companies, to the ports, and all labor and services along the way. At the same time the farmer will be sitting on top of the world on account of the Government's pegging the price of the 6,000,000 bales at parity, that is, at around 16 or 17 cents a pound. My own opinion is that this is a sound solution. In this way there will cease to be angers and antagonisms and hatreds of the farmers toward those who buy their cotton too cheaply to suit the producer, and in this way each and every branch of the great cotton industry will be working in harmony and to a common end of making the South the richest land in the world, just as it now is the richest producer of a raw product in the world and yet saves too little of net wealth from its production, handling, and sale.

(13) I anticipate that you will say this is a bounty, a gratuity, a bonus. If you say that, I agree with you that it is, and I tell you that that is exactly what I am trying to do and shall try to persuade the Congress to do. Since the Government has always granted bounties to big organizations that exploit or serve the unorganized public, why is it such a terrible crime if, for once, the same Government pays out equivalent blessings to those who make normal, national life possible—that is, the producer of raw materials? The shipping is supported by bounty. Most of the railroads were built by the bounty of Nation or State through land grants. The tariff is nothing but a bounty thrown to the rich manufacturer. The permission to issue bank notes based on United States bonds, to be lent out to the people for interest while at the same time drawing interest on the bonds themselves, is nothing in the world but a bounty granted by the Government to the banks in order to help them succeed and do a useful public function. The Air Mail Service is almost exclusively performed because the Government grants a bounty to the companies carrying the mails, and the same is true with the vast amounts, considering the weight of mail, carried by the railroads. When gentlemen rise up to denounce Government favors when they are to apply to poor and distressed and scattered and helpless people, I invite their attention to the fact that I have never heard a single one of them denounce these Government bounties to the banks, to the railroads, the steamship companies, the manufacturers—to organized wealth, to put it plainly.

(14) The South buys $1,000,000,000 of food manufactured in the North each year and vast supplies of every sort that the North manufactures and sells to the South. Let the producer of cotton be again wrecked, and that destroys American business very largely; keep him prosperous by the above plan, and at the same time restore prosperity to other handlers of cotton who have been injured by the year or two we have been lifting the farmer out of despair, and we restore American trade in every way. I love very dearly the theory and the practice of individual liberty, but I love equally well the theory of "equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none." It is not possible to speedily destroy special gratuities and bounties existing by law so long that they have grown mildewed; and therefore I have no abhorrence whatever in using the same basis of bounty to bless our people, because I know that in thus blessing them we are blessing the whole country.

(15) The Congress is a strange place. Men come from every section and of every race and creed and condition of constituencies. It will remain a mystery to me to the end of my life how we succeeded in doing by the A. A. A. and the Bankhead bill what we did for the cotton producer. The new Congress contains 83 men who never served there before, and for the first time the Democratic membership from the South are in the minority. We may, or we may not, be able to persuade our Democratic brethren and our Republican friends in the Congress to join with us in this inspiring enterprise I have pictured to you as my purpose.

But, as we succeeded in the other instance, I have hope we may succeed in this instance with this plan. If we do, never again will there be broken hearts and ruined fortunes and wrecked hopes in the homes of the yeomanry who produce the South's monopoly of cotton as an indispensable factor in southern and in national prosperity. But we will by this plan correct injuries to the other elements in the cotton business necessary to its successful conduct and will have made the South what it seems to be nature destined it for, not only the fairest but the richest, the most prosperous, and the happiest portion of the globe.

With kind regards and every good wish,

Sincerely your friend,

JOE H. EAGLE.

UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Resolution 19.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, appointed by the Speaker to conduct certain investigations under authority of House Resolution 198 of the Seventy-third Congress, is hereby granted additional time until February 4, 1935, to prepare and file its report and recommendations for legislation with the House. Any unexpended balance of the total amount authorized for the use of said special committee under House Resolution 199 and House Resolution 424 of the Seventy-third Congress is hereby continued available until said date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, in order to ask the gentleman a question, as I understand the situation there is no more testimony to be taken, but this resolution simply grants an extension of time to make out the report which the committee has not been able to make up to the present time?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly. We have been conducting public hearings up until last Saturday. The purpose of this resolution is exactly as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] states.

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to object, would it not be in order, under this extension of time, for the gentleman's committee to hold further hearings, if found necessary?

Mr. McCORMACK. No, no. The purpose is simply to extend the time that we might make the report, and to use any unexpended appropriated balance for that purpose. What the full committee will do with reference to its recommendations to the House is a matter that will be incorporated in the report.

Mr. FISH. What is the latest date upon which the report may be submitted?

Mr. McCORMACK. According to this resolution it would be at any time up until February 4.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it contemplated that there will be any employment of additional personnel?

Mr. McCORMACK. No. As a matter of fact, there has been a curtailment.

Mr. BLANTON. There will not be asked any additional sums other than that which has already been appropriated?

Mr. McCORMACK. I assure the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that there will not be any additional sums asked on the resolution under which the committee is functioning.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Reserving the right to object, is it going to be possible for the Members of this House to get copies of the transcript of testimony before this committee, both the executive and public hearings?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, of course, the gentleman knows that executive hearings are not for the public.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I am talking about Members of the House and not the public. Is it possible to obtain a transcript of the executive hearings?

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not want to pass upon that question.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Well, I want to know. I have tried to get a transcript of some of these executive hearings and have been unable to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his permission, if it is not a fact that, during the history of this Government, any Member of Congress can see the papers in the various departments, that are not made public, if he requests to see them?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly.

Mr. BLANTON. Any Member of Congress could see papers in the gentleman's committee if he requested to see them. That has always been the practice.

Mr. McCORMACK. Any Member of the House who is interested and, naturally, I would assume that the information they obtain would, in turn, be treated as confidential by them.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, under their oaths as Representatives.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I have tried to get a copy of the transcripts of the executive sessions and have not been able to do so.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has not tried with me.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I will try with the gentleman, if he assures me that I can see them.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am always glad to see the gentleman on any occasion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

FULL CASH PAYMENT ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES AS PROVIDED IN H. R. 1

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a copy of a bill I have introduced today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the following is a copy of the bill that I introduced today providing for full and immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates:

A bill to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates and for controlled expansion of the currency

Be it enacted, etc., That title V of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof three new sections, to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veterans (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed, it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is made but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs, but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section, has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If, at the time this section takes effect, a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor, he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509, shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the place of their residence.

"SEC. 2. (a) Payment of the face value of adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or section 510 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, shall be made in United States notes not bearing interest. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue such notes in such amount as may be required to make such payment, and of the same wording, form, size, and denominations as United States notes issued under existing law, except that the wording thereon shall conform to the provisions of this act. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed jointly to prescribe rules and regulations for the delivery of such notes in payment under section 509 or section 510 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

"(b) United States notes issued pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be lawful money of the United States and shall be fixed by law. Such notes shall be legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received shall be reissued. Such notes, when held by any national banking association or Federal Reserve bank, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve. The provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 14, 1900, as amended (U. S. C., title 31, secs. 314 and 408), and section 26 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 409), are hereby made applicable to such notes in the same manner and to the same extent as such provisions shall apply at the time of the enactment of this act or in the future to United States notes.

"SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the index number of the wholesale all-commodity prices rise above the index number of such prices for the years 1921 and 1929, as computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the following methods for contracting the issues of currency in the United States may be in force and effect, in the manner and to the extent prescribed in subsection (b) of this section:

"(1) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of national-bank circulating notes and the retirement of such notes secured by direct obligations of the United States.

"(2) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of national-bank circulating notes and the retirement of such notes from circulation as rapidly as practicable

"(3) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of Federal Reserve notes secured only by gold or gold certificates.

"(4) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of Federal Reserve notes secured by notes, drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, or bankers' acceptances which are not issued in direct benefit of commerce, industry, or agriculture.

"(b) Any such method of contracting currency issues may be applicable when the Secretary of the Treasury finds that its application is necessary in order to maintain the index number of wholesale all-commodity prices at the approximate level of the index number of such prices for the years 1921 to 1929, or to prevent undue expansion of the currency, and issues an order setting forth such finding. Each such order shall prescribe such rules and regulations as are necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this section with respect to the method of contraction made applicable in the order. The Secretary may make such methods applicable in the order in which they are set forth in subsection (a) of this section or in any order he chooses. When any such order is issued with respect to Federal Reserve notes, the Federal Reserve Board shall take such action as may be necessary to facilitate the enforcement of the order.

"SEC. 4. Section 505 (authorizing annual appropriations ending with the year 1946 for the payment of adjusted-service certificates of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, except the first sentence thereof) is hereby repealed. Amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund are hereby authorized to be made available for the expenses of printing and engraving United States notes issued under this act for paying fractional parts of a dollar which cannot be paid in United States notes issued under the provisions of this act and for paying the principal and interest on or in respect of loans pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c) of section 509 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

"SEC. 5. This act may be cited as the 'Adjusted Compensation Act, 1933.'"

FULL PAYMENT WITHOUT INTEREST DEDUCTION

It will be noted that the veterans are to be paid the full face value of their adjusted-service certificates without deduction of interest after October 1, 1931; and the payment is to be made in United States notes or Treasury notes, as they are often called, and are not to be retired. That in the event there is danger of undue expansion of the currency, the Secretary of the Treasury may cause to be withdrawn from circulation sufficient money that has been issued to the national banks and Federal Reserve banks, to prevent it.

ARGUMENT NO. I FOR FULL PAYMENT

If the average veteran who was entitled to a $460 credit is now permitted to receive that $460 as of June 5, 1918, a date which represents the half-way period between the beginning and ending of the average man's service, with 6-percent interest compounded annually from that time, he was entitled to receive $1,000 on October 1, 1931, which is the face value of his adjusted-service certificate. It will be noted that in this illustration the $60 was not deducted and the 25-percent increase for waiting was not allowed or considered. The average veteran was entitled to a credit of $460 is the reason this amount is given in the illustration.

ARGUMENT NO. II FOR FULL PAYMENT

If a veteran representing the average who was entitled to a credit of $460 for adjusted pay is paid that sum at this time by the Government, as of the time he rendered the service, and he is given the part of the 25-percent increase for waiting that 16½ years bear to 20 years, and he is allowed 6 percent simple interest from that time, the same rate that the Government allowed others on contracts growing out of the war, he is entitled to receive, as of December 5, 1934, the sum of $1,104.29, which is $104.29 more than the face value of his adjusted-service certificate. It will be noticed that the $60 was not deducted and a proportionate part of the 25-percent increase is allowed in this computation, but the interest rate is 6 percent simple interest, the same rate that was allowed income-tax payers, war contractors, and others. It is 16½ years from June 5, 1918, to December 5, 1934.

ARGUMENT NO. III FOR FULL PAYMENT

If the average veteran who was entitled to $460 credit for adjusted pay has deducted from the amount $60, but is given credit for the proportionate part of the 25-percent increase for waiting that 16½ years bear to 20 years, and is allowed 6 percent simple interest from the time he rendered the services, he is entitled to receive, as of December 5, 1934, $960.01. Remember this computation excludes the $60, allowing a part of the 25-percent increase, which Congress said was right, and allows 6 percent simple interest.

FALLACIOUS ARGUMENTS

No informed person will contend either of the following:

First, that it was right for the Government to deduct from the amount due each veteran the $60. It was not right, but was wrong, made an Indian giver out of the Government, and discriminated against the veteran who had served throughout the war in favor of those who served only a short time, and high ranking officers who received enormous salaries, in addition to allowances and assistance of orderlies, who were enlisted men. Second, that the Government has ever allowed the veteran anything as compensation in the form of interest for the period of time from the date his service was rendered until January 1, 1925. In fact, the final draft of the legislation in 1924 was hurriedly agreed upon and injustices and inequalities that were expected and were caused thereby should be hastily corrected.

NO BONUS

House bill 1 is often referred to as the "bonus bill." I have never used the word "bonus" in connection with the proposal and never expect to. I am hopeful that the veterans will refrain from using the word "bonus" and instead use the phrase "adjusted-service certificates."

DEBT CONFESSED

A congressional committee, after a thorough and exhaustive investigation, decided that the veterans who served during the World War did not receive fair compensation for their services; that each veteran should be allowed another dollar for every day he served in America and $1.25 a day extra for each day served overseas. In arriving at this amount the lowest paid laborer was used as a yardstick and not the wages of from $8 to $30 a day paid in the shipyards. The sensible way to have paid it would have been in cash at the time, but the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, predicted that there was going to be a huge deficit at the end of the fiscal year and it would disrupt the finances of the Government to make such an enormous payment. Mr. Mellon's view prevailed and, instead of veterans being paid in cash, they were given an I O U postdated check, or tombstone certificate, payable January 1, 1945. It was later discovered that the Secretary of the Treasury's estimate concerning the deficit was wrong by approximately $1,000,000,000. The discovery that it was wrong did not help the veterans; it was too late, as intended.

HEARING EXPECTED SOON

At an early date a hearing on this bill before the Ways and Means Committee is expected. I am assured by the leaders of the House that no effort will be made to prevent consideration of this bill, but, on the other hand, an effort will be made to expedite its consideration in the House of Representatives. In the near future I hope to have an opportunity to discuss every question involved in this legislation on the floor of the House.

$163,000 DAILY INTEREST

Veterans are paying $163,000 daily to the banks and to the Government in compound interest on loans made to them on their adjusted-service certificates. An old Negro said, "Compound interest is dat intrust which you cain't never pay."

The beneficiary of the average veteran who dies this year will receive approximately $400 after the loan and interest are paid. The beneficiary of the average veteran who dies in 1944 will receive $68.50. On an average, 80 veterans are dying each day; therefore, approximately $32,000 is paid to the beneficiaries of these veterans each day. It is unfair for the Government to require 3,000,000 veterans to lose the remainder due on their adjusted-service certificates by compelling them to pay compound interest to the banks and to the Government in order to permit the beneficiaries of less than one-half million of these veterans to receive benefits from the certificates instead of permitting the veterans themselves to collect the remainder due. Less than 500,000 are expected to die before 1945.

AGAINST VETERANS' INTEREST

A prominent gentleman informed me a few days ago that from the standpoint of the veterans' welfare the certificates should not be paid now, stating that if the payments were made, a large percentage of the veterans would merely use the money to keep off the relief rolls, thereby saving the Government that much money by using their own funds. The answer to that is: The veterans should prefer using their money, and I am sure they do, in a way that will prevent them from being compelled to accept relief rather than have the Government and the banks consume the remainder due through the payment of compound interest.

HOW AVERAGE CERTIFICATE ARRIVED AT

Each veteran was allowed $1 a day extra for each day he served in the United States and $1.25 a day extra for each day he served overseas, with a limitation of $500 for home service and $625 for service overseas. John Doe, a veteran, was entitled to a credit of $460—$210 for 210 days' home service and $250 for $200 days' service overseas. The first $60 was deducted, reducing his credit to $400. Since he was being given a certificate due in the future, 20 years from date, the Government increased the amount of his credit by 25 percent for waiting, making the credit $500. He was then given a certificate for an amount equal to the $500 credit with 4-percent interest, compounded annually, for the 20 years, which amounted to $1,000. His certificate was dated January 1, 1925, and made payable January 1, 1945, or at death. This illustration represents the average veteran's service certificate.

OTHERS RECEIVED ADJUSTED PAY

Seven thousand war contractors received adjusted pay amounting to billions, directly and indirectly, after the war was over; many of them had invalid and illegal contracts which were validated by Congress. They were paid in cash. The railroad owners received a guaranteed return during the war equal to the average return 3 years prior to America's entrance into the war, which was the most prosperous period of railroading in the United States; in addition, they were given $3,000,000 a day extra pay for the next 6 months after being released from Government operation. Their adjustments in pay amounted to between one and two billion dollars; they were paid in cash. There were about 500,000 Federal civilian employees during the war, all of them receiving $2,500 a year or less had their pay adjusted, and the average received $1,000 extra pay. It was paid in cash. Many soldiers worked on the public roads in America during the war, side by side with civilians who were receiving $8 a day; these soldiers received an adjustment of $7 a day, representing the difference between their soldier pay of $1 a day and the $8 a day drawn by the civilians. They were paid in cash after the war. Foreign countries, our allies during the war, were loaned billions of dollars by our Government after the war was over. They used a part of this money to pay their own veterans adjusted compensation and bonuses aggregating as high, in some instances, as $7,290 each.

DEBT REALLY PAST DUE

The debt is really past due now, although payable in 1945. The adjusted-service certificate gives the veteran the $1 a day for home service and the $1.25 a day for service overseas as of January 1, 1925, thereby depriving the holder of approximately 7 years' interest. If one is entitled to a certain amount daily or monthly over a period of time, the interest should be computed by allowing full interest from a date representing a time halfway between the beginning and ending of the period, about June 5, 1918.

TAX REFUNDS AND 6-PERCENT INTEREST

When the war was over applications for tax refunds were filed by individuals and corporations, many of them claiming that they had paid too much income taxes during the war and others claiming that they failed to deduct a sufficient amount for depreciation of their facilities used in war services. These claims were made, although they had made and sworn to the income-tax returns themselves. The Secretary of the Treasury refunded to large income-tax payers more than three thousand million, or $3,000,000,000, from the year 1922 to the year 1929, inclusive, an amount more than sufficient to pay the remainder of the adjusted-service certificates in full. Much of this money was refunded or given back to them on the theory that the taxpayers did not charge off a sufficient amount for depreciation in value of their properties during the war from 1917–19. A large part of it was refunded in plain violation of the law. A large number of the beneficiaries of these large gifts were war profiteers and should have been convicted of treason for dissipating and plundering our resources during the war. When each refund was paid the Treasury also paid the one receiving it 6-percent interest from the year it was claimed the deduction should have been made. On one refund to the United States Steel Corporation of $15,736,595.72 interest amounting to more than $10,099,765 was paid. Mr. Andrew Mellon, while Secretary of the Treasury, made large refunds to himself and to his companies, and in each case allowed 6 percent interest from the year he claims the credits should have been given and not from 1925, the date of the adjusted-service certificates, or 7 years later. Those who are so loud in their denunciation of the proposal to pay the veterans this honest debt have been just as silent as the tomb while these war profiteers were wrongfully getting billions of dollars from the Treasury.

One receiving a tax refund in 1925 for an alleged overpayment in 1918 was paid 6-percent interest from 1918 on the amount of the payment. There is no reason why the veterans should not be paid from the time they rendered their services until 1925, the date of the certificates.

AMOUNT VETERANS IN EACH STATE WILL RECEIVE

If H. R. 1 becomes a law it will be a long step in a direction of stopping the issuance of more tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. Not another dollar's worth of them should ever be issued. There is no difference between many of the Government obligations that are deposited by banks as collateral security for the issuance of money and the adjusted-service certificates, a Government obligation held by the veterans. They are both made payable in 1945. They are both backed by the credit of this Nation. They are both obligations of this Nation. Money purchased one, services the other. If it is fair for the bank, it is fair for the veterans. In our plan, if there is too much money in circulation, the banks will be required to return their currency, or part of it, and receive their bonds in exchange, thereby taking a certain amount of money out of circulation.

If this bill is enacted into law, the veterans in the following-named States will receive the amounts indicated:

The figures in parentheses represent the number of veterans holding certificates and the other figures represent the total amount that will be paid to them after deducting all prior loans and interest before October 1, 1931.

There are 3,531,800 veterans of the World War who hold adjusted-service certificates as of December 1, 1934. The aggregate face or maturity value of these certificates is $3,485,650,000, or an average of $959.88 each. After the 50 percent loan act was passed, veterans who were entitled to certificates of small amounts applied for them, which caused the amount of the average certificate to be reduced.

It is estimated that 49,806 of these veterans reside in Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Canal Zone, Canada, Cuba, Mexico, and other places outside of the limits of the United States.

Three million thirty-eight thousand five hundred of the 3,531,800 veterans holding certificates have borrowed $1,465,000,000 on their certificates, not including interest after October 1, 1931.

After deducting all prior loans, with interest to October 1, 1931, there is estimated to be a remainder due to the 3,531,800 veterans in the sum of $2,015,162,456.76, which includes the amount due the ones who have not negotiated loans on their certificates; interest on loans prior to October 1, 1931, amounts to a comparatively small sum.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Q. Are we asking for a revision of the contract?—A. Yes; in order that another part of the contract, the legislative intent, may be carried out. Congress contemplated that the veterans should be paid the adjusted pay as of the time the services were rendered and not 7 years later without interest. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House reporting the adjusted-compensation legislation in the year 1924 states two objects they had in mind, as follows:

> That it should represent an amount approximately equal to the difference between what the soldier received and what he should have received. That it should confer substantial benefits upon the soldiers.

The first object is not carried out by paying the veterans the amount representing that difference 7 years later. The second object is not carried out if the money is paid in dribs and a large part of the principal consumed by the payment of compound interest on loans.

Q. Have others ever asked the Government for a revision of contracts?—A. Yes; the foreign countries that borrowed billions from us asked for a revision of their contracts. In the revision that was granted them they were given more than $10,000,000,000 by our Government. Hundreds of thousands of income-tax payers have asked the Government to revise their income-tax returns and allow them credits, refunds, and abatements. This has been done and more than $3,000,000,000 refunded in that manner. The income-tax returns were prepared wholly by the ones wanting the refunds, yet they asked for a revision and got it. The foreign countries asking for a revision of their contracts were parties to the contracts and had a voice in their making. The veteran had no other alternative than to accept the adjusted-service certificate in the form in which it was offered to him. He did not make it out and agree to it like the income-tax payers or the foreign countries.

Q. What is our plan?—A. It is to have the Government convert the veterans' adjusted-service certificates—which are noncirculating Government obligations—into United States notes—Government circulating obligations.

Q. Will not the plan involve the issuance of fiat or printing-press money, and will it not be unbridled inflation?—A. No; it will be the same kind of money as all other paper money now in circulation which together represents about 90 percent of our circulating medium at this time. The bill to pay these certificates has a provision against unbridled inflation and provides for controlled expansion of the currency. According to the terms of the bill, if there should be danger of unbridled inflation, the Government will be privileged to withdraw from Federal Reserve banks and national banks a sufficient amount of the currency issued to them in return for Government bonds to prevent such inflation. Personally, I expect the money issued to the veterans to remain in circulation. No one will be paying interest on it. Someone is paying interest on money issued by banks every day it is outstanding. We have $8,000,000,000 in gold. This is sufficient for the issuance of $20,000,000,000 on the basis of a 40-percent gold reserve. We only have about $5,000,000,000 in circulation now. Therefore, we could go back on the gold standard and still be able to issue additional money to the amount of $15,000,000,000. No logical reason can be given why this money should not be issued.

Q. Is there a precedent for issuing such money?—A. Either of the 12 Federal Reserve banks can obtain money from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by making deposits of United States Government obligations. They can deposit a million dollars in Government bonds and receive a million dollars in new money. The only cost to such Federal Reserve bank is the cost of printing, which is about 27 cents a thousand dollars. National banks are permitted to the extent of their capital stock to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States direct obligations of the Government and receive in return national-bank currency greenbacks. Such banks must deposit 5 percent of the money in a retirement fund. While the banks, both national and Federal Reserve, obtain the use of the money, they also get interest on the bonds deposited.

Q. Compare our plan with the plan used by the national banks and Federal Reserve banks to obtain money from the Government on Government obligations.—A. The veteran has a Government obligation payable January 1, 1945. We are asking that he be permitted to deposit that obligation and receive new money in return for the remainder due in the same way and manner that national banks and Federal Reserve banks are permitted to deposit Government obligations, payable in 1945, and receive new money in return for them. In each case a Government obligation payable in the future is deposited to authorize the issuance of money. In each case a noncirculating Government obligation, or Government bond, is converted into a circulating obligation, money. The veteran will not continue to draw interest on the deposited obligation until it is payable. In the case of a veteran, the total indebtedness of the Nation will not be increased. In the case of the banks, the total indebtedness of the Nation is increased. In other words, if the Government issues a thousand-dollar bond and sells it to a bank, that is one obligation. If the Government accepts the deposit of that thousand-dollar bond and issues a thousand dollars in new currency to the owner, that is an additional Government obligation, as the Government guarantees to pay both the money and the bond. In neither case will there be a specific gold reserve set aside as a fractional coverage to redeem the paper money. However, we have ample gold for that purpose. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is running every working day and often overtime in order to print money to replace worn-out bills and new money for the national banks and Federal Reserve banks; it has 4,500 employees and prints a billion new bills a year; it turns out about four tons of new paper money a day. There are 500 bills to the pound, whether they are $1 bills or $10,000 bills. The money to be issued to the veterans will be the same kind of money. The money issued to the banks is sound. Therefore, the money issued to the veterans will be sound. It costs the Government tens of millions of dollars a year to pay interest on the Government bonds which the banks deposit to secure the paper money they obtain from the Government. Since the War between the States, we have had outstanding in this Nation $346,000,000 in United States notes. This is a free medium of exchange and no one is paying interest on it. The fact that the people have not had to pay interest on that paper money has saved them an outlay through the years of more than $11,000,000,000 on the basis of 5-percent compound interest annually.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

We have 12 Federal Reserve banks in this Nation. Each of these banks has an official that is authorized by the United States Government to cause to be printed and delivered to it new money, paper currency, produced by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving in Washington. In order to get this money the bank deposits with itself a Government obligation, which may be payable January 1, 1945, or any other date, as collateral security for the issuance of the money. While the bank uses the money it continues to get interest on the bonds. It pays on the average of 27 cents a thousand dollars for the cost of printing the money. They eat their cake and keep it, too. Approximately three and one-half billion dollars have been issued to Federal Reserve banks in this way.

EAT THEIR CAKE AND KEEP IT, TOO

National banks of the country have deposited approximately a billion dollars in United States Government bonds, many of them payable January 1, 1945, and have received approximately a billion dollars in new money in return. Each of these banks can use that money as a reserve and lend $10 in credits on every one of these dollars that it has in its vaults or with the Reserve bank. These national banks continue to get interest on the bonds while they are using the money. They eat their cake and keep more cake than they have eaten.

FAIR FOR BANKS, FAIR FOR VETERANS

No person can possibly give a logical reason why it is not right for a veteran to deposit his Government obligation, which is payable January 1, 1945, and receive new money in return for it, and at the same time contend that it is fair and right for banks to deposit Government obligations payable January 1, 1945, and receive new money in return for them. If it is right for the banks, it is right for the veterans. If the money issued to the banks is good money, and it is, the money issued to the veterans will be good money.

The greenbacks, about which the bankers, deflationists, and tories try to frighten the people, have saved the taxpayers of our country $12,223,477,500 up to November 30, 1934. These calculations are based on an interest rate of 5 percent, compounded. We have $346,000,000 of this new money in circulation now. It is good money; no one refuses to take it.

ENORMOUS INTEREST BURDEN

The outstanding Government interest-bearing obligations on November 30, 1934, were $26,780,967,700. The average rate of interest on the obligations is 3 percent. The compound interest on this sum to 1965 is $38,194,924,859.09, and we will still owe the principal. During the next 60 years, or up to 1995, these interest-bearing outstanding Government obligations will crush our people with the unthinkable sum of $130,904,032,500.32, at 3 percent compound interest, and we will still owe the principal of $26,760,967,700.

I can personally guarantee that these calculations are correct and can be verified through the Treasury of the United States. These interest-bearing, tax-exempt obligations should be gradually retired and relieve us and our children from this impossible interest and tax burden. The payment of the adjusted-service certificates in new money is a long step in that direction.

H. R. 1 provides that the veterans be given the same opportunity to get money from the Government on Government obligations as is now provided by law for the banks. If there is danger of inflation after this money is paid, H. R. 1 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may withdraw a certain amount of money to prevent unbridled inflation. According to H. R. 1, however, the Secretary of the Treasury cannot withdraw any of the money we propose to issue, as we expect it to remain in permanent circulation, as no one will be paying interest on that money while it is outstanding, but the Secretary of the Treasury will be allowed to require Federal Reserve banks or national banks to return a part of their money and receive back their Government bonds which they have deposited to secure it. In other words, in actual practice the Secretary of the Treasury could take bankers' money out of circulation while veterans' money is being put into circulation. This is a complete answer to any charge of unbridled inflation.

RESULTS IF BILL ENACTED

If this bill is enacted into law it will result in the following:

First. It will save the Government more than a billion dollars, or $112,000,000 a year for 12 years.

Second. It will save the Government more than $10,000,000 in administration expenses of the Adjusted Compensation Act between now and 1945.

Third. It will pay a debt heretofore confessed by the Government to the veterans for services rendered. It is no bonus. The term "bonus" is a misnomer.

Fourth. It will be granting to the veterans the right to deposit a Government obligation and receive in return therefor new currency, the same right that is now enjoyed by Federal Reserve banks and all national banks.

Fifth. It will prevent the veterans from losing a valuable equity by releasing them from the payment of compound interest on their loans. Veterans who have borrowed 50 percent under the present law will have very little remaining in 1945. It is not right for the Government and the banks to consume these valuable equities by requiring the veterans to pay compound interest on their own money.

Sixth. It will require no bond issue, no increase in taxes, no additional interest payment by the Government. The debt must be paid sometime. Everybody will be helped if it is paid now.

Seventh. It will partly restore to Congress its constitutional duty to issue money and deprive a few privileged bankers of a monopoly on the Government's credit.

Purchasing power must be placed in the hands of the masses. In this way it can be distributed quickly without the possibility of graft or favoritism. It is the best plan that has been proposed to be used as a vehicle to convey additional money into the hands of those who will buy goods.

A PROPOSED DEPARTMENT OF GOOD WORKS—RECOVERY OF MORAL VALUES ESSENTIAL TO NATIONAL RECOVERY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 28, 1934, at a meeting characterized by splendid religious enthusiasm, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Rumanian Orthodox Christian Church of Indianapolis, Ind., was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies. At the request of some friends and by permission of the House, I herewith insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the address I delivered on that occasion, which I believe is pertinent to the present distress of the country and to national recovery. It is as follows:

Mr. Lupear, Governor McNutt, ladies, and gentlemen, in Washington City we have been living for many months in an atmosphere of amazing new creations. New bureaus and agencies and commissions have been springing up like mushrooms on every hand, representing the results of social and economic planning on an unprecedented scale. With my mind filled and thrilled with these adventures in temporal government, it has occurred to me that all of us might profit if we would add to the social and economic planning some spiritual planning.

The human mind is so created that it operates most efficiently when charted by an orderly course; and when we are so busily engaged in founding new establishments of government, I think it would be well for America if each of us would create in his own being a spiritual department—a department of good works, if you please—to be devoted not to business recovery, as is the aim of all the new Washington bureaus, but to a recovery of the spiritual values. I am one of those who believe that the low estate into which we as a nation have fallen, with suffering and misery unprecedented and unspeakable, is largely due to a growing indifference to the things of the spirit. We have wandered far from God, and it is high time we should retrace our footsteps to the throne of grace.

STRENGTHENING OF MORAL RESERVES NEEDED

America's greatest need today is the strengthening of its moral reserves. If everyone of us would shape his course of action by the precepts of Christianity, how simple government would become! No longer would it be necessary to enforce justice between man and man by the strong arm of government, and we could do away with most of our boards and bureaus. The decrees of justice would be engraven on men's hearts, and no enforcement officer would be needed save the silent monitor called conscience.

As rational human beings, conscientiously seeking to do our full duty as members of society and living in hope that our acts in this world will entitle us to immortality beyond the grave, we should order our lives on lines of practical idealism. No admonition contained in the Holy Scriptures is more potent or more pregnant with meaning than the command that we should prove our faith by our works.

There exists in our society—in every society of humans, in fact—a certain large percentage of persons of the most benevolent disposition, who are saturated with good purposes, who think only the most sublimated thoughts and radiate only good will toward all mankind—and do nothing. They live in an aura of friendliness, harbor no evil designs, and seem to think that they will glide right into heaven on a wave of good intentions. They are like the community busybody who worked himself into a lather of perspiration making a long speech in behalf of the submerged tenth and wound up his perfervid exhortation by shouting:

"I move that we give three cheers for the poor!"

The road to hell is paved with good intentions; but when good intentions are harnessed to good works, there is no limit to the sublimity and grandeur of achievement that may be expected. Let us then make practical idealism our guiding star; and if we do that, we will live a life in harmony with the preachments of our Savior.

CHRIST A PRACTICAL IDEALIST

For Jesus Christ was a practical idealist. His heart bled for the poor; but unlike the visionary philanthropist referred to, He was not content to give three cheers for the poor and then rest. He was a workingman. He was one of the busiest men that ever trod this planet. Day and night He went about trying to do good. His life is, or should be, a shining example to those who imagine that the barge that is carrying them on toward the heaven of their dreams is propelled by sentiment alone—sentiment without works. The life of a true Christian is never soft and easy. The real Christian puts himself in the place of the poor and unfortunate, those who are suffering and distressed, disconsolate and downcast in spirit, and he does by them as he would that others would do unto him if he were in their situation. He makes sacrifices, undergoes hardships and privations; his soul is seared with the scars of many conflicts in behalf of humanity, but he goes on and on undaunted and unafraid. Usually such a character does not loom up in his true proportions until he has crossed the boundaries of eternity. Then, and not until then, does the world begin to appraise him at his true value, realizing at last that neither time nor tide, nor things past nor present, nor things to come, of whatever moment, may dim or tarnish the unfading splendor of his life of service.

TEMPLE OF THE SOUL

I would establish the spiritual department of good works, of which I speak, in the inner temple of every living soul. I would make it a sanctuary of sanctuaries and would illumine it with the beacon light of reason and of faith. Over the portal I would place the ever-inspiring motto, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." On the wall of the sanctuary, where the eyes of the spirit would never cease to look upon it, would be that other motto, so dear to the heart of every true Christian:

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

Among the mural adornments of this temple of the soul I would place a picture of the Good Samaritan helping the stranger out of the ditch and caring for his wounds, a perfect example of Christian service, and a picture of Lazarus pleading for crumbs from the rich man's table—the most impressive of all reminders in sacred literature that God expects us to be kind to the poorest and humblest of His representatives on earth and will hold us to the strictest accountability if we are not.

I should like to make my department of good works the biggest thing in my life, and I pray that I may have the vision, the strength of character, and the will to do so. I should like to make it a place where goodness would pour out incessantly to all who are weary and heavy-laden. I should like to think that it may be the instrumentality to strike the shackles of sensuality from my soul and liberate my spirit from the slavery of selfishness. I should like for it to stand for the dignity of childhood and for the right of the little ones to proper living conditions and the opportunity to grow and bloom into perfect manhood and womanhood.

In arranging the daily program of our department of good works we should try to see how many good acts we can perform every day, such acts as Christ would be doing if He were on earth. A fair way to decide upon the quality of a contemplated act, whether it is appropriate or permissible, would be to ask oneself the question, "If Christ were here, would I be willing to be found doing it in His presence?"

OUR GOLD AND FRANKINCENSE AND MYRRH

If you ask me what should be the guiding principle of this department of good works—a department that has no existence in the world of tangible things, but which, if we so will, may have a very real and controlling existence in the realm of the spirit—my reply will be:

"Read the parable of the Good Samaritan, and you will find the answer. When we show loving kindness toward the poorest of God's creatures, we do the will of Jesus. By that good act we pay our homage to His name. We lay at His feet our gold and frankincense and myrrh."

The poor we have always with us. In the byways are the sick and hungry and those who are starving for the spiritual things of life. Let us seek them out and help them, doing for them the best we can, nor ever counting the cost. Though we may be reduced to rags by this life of service and self-denial, we will wear the livery of the King of Kings and we will enjoy the highest privilege given to mortals—the privilege of helping others. If we go looking for opportunities to render loving service, we will find them all around us. We can do nothing better, we can do nothing finer, we can do nothing grander, than to help our fellow mortals over the rough places of life. That is what Jesus of Nazareth did; that is what all the saints of all the ages have done; that, as I conceive it, is Christianity, and there is no more beautiful, no sweeter philosophy of life than is contained in the quaint old phrase:

"Do all the good you can, in all the ways you can, to all the people you can, just as long as you can."

If we strive to be what the Bible calls "doers of the word", if we seek sincerely and systematically to fill our days with good deeds, we shall discover never-ending variation and enjoyment in our work, and we shall find that the maintenance of our spiritual department of good works will become a constantly easier task as benefaction becomes our fixed and dominating impulse.

MOST MAJESTIC CHARACTER

And in all our lives of service until the end comes and we fall asleep we should keep in the foreground of our minds the Great Exemplar of Good Works, the sweetest and most majestic character of all the ages, whose life from the manger to the cross is a rainbow of hope for all the human race. We need to think of Him to enrich our spirituality and to lead the way to the only life of real happiness, which is a life of service to others.

There is in our city of Indianapolis a wonderful painting of the Savior by Titian, owned by an Indianapolis man, which portrays with touching pathos the agony of the cross. In that picture the genius of the great artist has epitomized with a mastery that goes straight as an arrow to the human heart the sacrifices of the Son of Man for the remission of sins. I wish that every day of our lives all of us could see that picture for the memories it recalls, for the sense of duty it inspires. We need to be sobered and seasoned in ways of right living by a comprehension of the Savior's unfathomable love and the suffering endured by that great human God in order that you and I, and whosoever will, may find the way through service to eternal life.

GOLD IN IDAHO

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, it is apparent that the people in charge of the department of government dealing with Federal-owned lands of my State, Idaho, are not familiar with its record of production of precious metals, particularly gold, and the importance to the administrative program of recovery of assisting in the development of the mining industry of the Northwest. We have the statement of the Director of the Bureau of Mines that there is in Idaho the greatest undeveloped gold area in the United States. In support of this statement I include herewith a letter from Mr. Reuben McGregor, a mining engineer, who has intimate knowledge of the gold resources of central Idaho.

ELK CITY, IDAHO, November 30, 1934.

Congressman COMPTON I. WHITE,
Clarks Fork, Idaho.

FRIEND COMPTON: I have your letter of November 11 asking for reliable information of placer gold production of the State of Idaho.

I would advise that you get this information from the United States Geological Survey and check it with the estimate from the United States Treasury Department. From time to time the United States Geological Survey has sent trained men to this State to gather this information, and they arrived on the ground 20 to 70 years after the ground was washed, looked the situation over, and made a conservative guess, which is authority on the subject, and I would advise that you get this information from the United States Geological Survey and use no other.

Some 25 years ago I made a map of the Salmon River region, marked the old placer camps on the map, with production in placer gold as related in old histories of the State. Of some of the southern camps I got the estimates of gold production from State Mine Inspector Robert Bell. Take Florence, for instance; I was well acquainted with Mr. Wallace Scott, of Grangeville, Idaho. Mr. Scott went to Florence in 1861, ran a store there during the big production, made enough money to open a store in Grangeville and start the First National Bank, of which he was president. He was a solid citizen and a very reliable old gentleman. He told me that Florence produced $82,000,000 in placer gold. I was in Florence in 1898, was acquainted with John Clark, who still at that date had a store in Florence that was run continuously from the sixties. Clark was Wells Fargo express office, and I went through the old express books; and while I have forgotten the amount of gold handled by the express company, I remember that the amount was so large that I have always believed that Mr. Wallace Scott's estimate is near correct. Many of the miners took their gold with them, and the express company took all the gold to Lewiston or Walla Walla, then down the river by boat to Portland, then by boat to San Francisco and the mint. No record was kept. I surmise that the sun-baked native sons of California, who are always on the job, credited all this Idaho gold to California's production and that a great amount of the gold in the golden sunshine of California came from Idaho. Florence for size was the richest placer ground ever found—only 6 feet to bedrock—a poor man's camp. Many of the miners went East, bought farms, married, and raised big families on Florence gold. Boise Basin is several times the size in area of Florence. The oldtimers—and I have known several—always claimed that Boise Basin produced 200 million in placer gold. There is no reliable record of the production. Hordes from China washed the ground after the whites. Some of the China gold went to the San Francisco Mint, some to China; no record kept. The big production of Idaho placer gold in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, going into the coffers of the North was a big factor, if not a deciding factor, in the winning of the Civil War.

Maj. Evan W. Kelly is making good on the promise to build the truck road from Elk City to Red River Valley. His engineer, Bert Harrin, has finished the survey, and it will make a good road, maximum grade 5 percent, 6 miles from Elk City to Red River Valley. When this is finished next summer, it will eliminate 6 miles of the worst road between here and Dixie. The road up Crooked River from the highway to Orogrande is broken through, and cars can go that way now, but it is not finished but will be in the early summer.

I am hoping that the Bureau of Public Roads will finish the highway, the remaining 3 miles to Elk City, and grade the main street for 2,000 feet, 50 feet wide, next summer. The State is plowing off the snow on the highway this winter to Red River bridge 3 miles out from Elk City. Mining men with small cars will be able to drive to within 3 miles all winter. This remaining 3 miles of highway should be finished next summer, so that mining men can drive to our town next winter. The road program is coming along fast, thanks to you, and all mines will be on a good road in the near future. Don't forget our 3 miles of highway to be built by the Bureau of Public Roads next summer and that 2,000 feet, 50 feet wide, up Main Street, Elk City.

Yours truly,

REUBEN MCGREGOR.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE AS IT AFFECTS THE BANKING SITUATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include therein a radio address I delivered before the Pittsburgh Rotary Club, Wednesday, December 5, 1934 on the subject of deposit insurance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address:

Members of the Pittsburgh Rotary Club and fellow rotarians, to speak to a representative group of business men who esteem "service above self" is a decided pleasure.

In a world which at times seems all too selfish, it is refreshing to reflect that the Rotary Club is a conspicuous example of enlightened unselfishness. That so many leading Pittsburgh business men have affiliated with an organization dedicated to high standards of business ethics and to the promotion of international friendship and good will indicates that they possess a high sense of civic duty.

My purpose today is to tell you something about Federal deposit insurance—a development which has had far-reaching beneficial effects upon the banking situation in the United States.

All of you, I am quite sure, remember only too vividly the banking holiday of March 1933. At that time every single bank throughout the country was closed; business was nearly at a standstill, and, worst of all, fear held the Nation in its grip. You will remember, too, the courageous manner in which President Roosevelt handled this delicate situation. He told the people that, as banks were licensed to reopen, they could have confidence in such institutions. They took him at his word, and today most of the scars left by last year's general banking holocaust have been obliterated.

However, something more was needed. The people realized that even though banks which were allowed to reopen must be in sound condition, this was not enough. They knew that sound banks could become unsound; that once strong institutions could weaken and finally collapse.

Therefore they wanted complete assurance that when they deposited funds in a bank, such money would always be available to them on call.

This assurance was given to them on January 1, 1934, when Federal deposit insurance became effective.

Today there are more than 14,000 banks located in every section of the United States which are members of the insurance fund administered by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Washington, D. C. Every single depositor in every single one of these banks is protected up to a maximum of $5,000.

Pennsylvania leads the Nation in the number of insured banks with 1,054, no other State having as many as 1,000. The institutions which are insured represent 96 percent of the licensed commercial banks in Pennsylvania, which indicates that the bankers of this Commonwealth have welcomed the protection afforded by Federal deposit insurance.

Even should one of these 14,000 insured banks fail—and, of course, the law of averages decrees that some of them must close—each depositor will be protected against loss up to the committed liability.

Some of the favorable effects of this protection, to mention a few, have been: (1) A tremendous decrease in the number of bank failures; (2) increases in deposits, partially as a result of the return of hoarded funds from hiding; (3) a complete absence of runs; and (4) a return of public confidence in banks.

During the first 10 months of 1934, which were also the first 10 months of operation of Federal deposit insurance, only six insured banks containing aggregate deposits of $1,510,034 closed their doors.

The few closings and the comparatively negligible amount of funds involved constituted a happy contrast with the appalling records of former years.

For instance, throughout the 12 years, 1921–32, the number of bank failures in the United States during the first 10 months alone of such years was 8,317, involving deposits of $3,518,040,000

In other words, during the first 10 months of 1934 an insured bank closed, on the average, every 1,224 hours, while the average amount of deposits in such closed institutions was $251,672, whereas during the first 10 months of the 12 years ending with 1932 a bank failed, on the average, every 11 hours, while the average amount of deposits in such failed institution was $422,993.

Surely you must admit that it is worth while that, as a result of Federal deposit insurance, a bank did not close every 11 hours during the first 10 months of 1934, and that therefore depositors did not lose $3,518,040,000 during those 10 months.

It is a well-known fact that many of the 8,317 banks which failed during the first 10 months of the years 1921–32 were "rumored to death." Previous to the inauguration of Federal deposit insurance it was frequently all too easy to start a run on a bank. At times merely a careless word would bring a crowd of depositors to a banking institution, all of them demanding their savings at the same time. As the word of the run spread, more and more people would flock to the bank. On occasions such sudden and unexpected runs caused sound and solvent banks to close their doors.

But today even the vicious cannot start a bank run for the public refuses to heed rumors or gossip about insured banks, knowing that Federal deposit insurance is giving them complete protection.

In the years prior to 1934 the closing of a bank was a major catastrophe for hundreds of people, many of them those who were least able to take a loss. Even when an institution closed, not because of insolvency but as a result of adverse rumors, there always ensued long, dreary delays before depositors would receive even a portion of their savings from the receiver.

Happily, that is not the case today. When an insured bank closes its doors, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation promptly steps in and begins reimbursing depositors. Some of you here, I am sure, can testify as to the speed and efficiency with which depositors were paid off when one of your local institutions closed its doors. Officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation began reimbursing depositors in the insured Pittsburgh bank which closed less than 48 hours after the Pennsylvania secretary of banking took possession of the institution for the purpose of liquidating it.

The same procedure was followed in other cities. Officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation have but one main objective—the protection of the bank depositors of the Nation. When an insured bank fails, they do not quibble, nor do they procrastinate. Rather, they bend their efforts to the repayment of depositors in the shortest possible time, in order that people may not be inconvenienced nor business adversely affected by the closing of an insured bank.

All of you have probably read reports in recent months telling of huge gains in bank deposits. For instance, the aggregate deposits in the 1,054 insured Pennsylvania banks increased by more than $350,000,000 between December 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934. Similar gains were reported in other States. Higher deposit totals, which have been largely due to Federal deposit insurance, tend to permit banks to loan more freely, which, in turn, hastens recovery and promotes employment.

People have heard so much about the protection of Federal deposit insurance that some few of them believe that all banks throughout the United States are insured.

Unfortunately, this is not correct.

While some 90 percent of the licensed institutions are affording their depositors this protection, there are banks which are not insured.

When an uninsured bank fails, as you can readily appreciate, depositors will, of course, receive nothing from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; whereas depositors in a bank which is insured are safeguarded up to a maximum of $5,000.

In order that the public might be able to tell at a glance whether a bank is insured or not, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has ruled that institutions affiliated with it must display a sign over every window where deposits are received, pointing out that each depositor is protected up to a limit of $5,000.

Before opening an account with a new bank, well-informed depositors always look for this sign of safety.

As members of a service organization, any one of you here may be asked at any time how to distinguish an insured from a noninsured bank. There is a simple answer which you can give to this question. Just tell the questioner to put the following query to his banker:

"Are funds deposited in your institution protected by Federal deposit insurance?"

If the answer is in the affirmative, the depositor can dismiss from his mind all fear as to the safety of his funds.

Like the members of a Rotary Club, the thousands of bankers who have endorsed the principles of Federal deposit insurance—which has as its primary function the protection of the average depositor against loss—believe in "service above self."

Surely such an attitude is deserving of our highest praise.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein certain letters which I wrote to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and replies thereto.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I must object to the inclusion of any extraneous or outside matter at the present time.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I may say that these are letters written to the Board of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and replies thereto.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE 30-HOUR-WORKWEEK BILL—FOR THE RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert therein a copy of a bill which I introduced today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much misunderstanding throughout the country of the purposes of the 30-hour-workweek bills reported by the Committee on Labor of the House to the House that I would like to say a word in reference to the bill which I have introduced in the House today. The purpose of the bill is to provide for a 30-hour workweek, a 6-hour day, and a 5-day week.

In general, the provisions of this bill extend to all forms of employment and to all employees in trades or industries engaged in producing, transporting, or distributing goods or services in or affecting interstate commerce, but does not apply to agricultural workers or to persons employed in domestic services or to employees subject to the Railway Labor Act.

Under the provisions of this bill no person shall be permitted to work more than 30 hours in any one week, 6 hours in any day, or 5 days in 1 week by any single employer, unless that employer, having assented to and complying fully with the requirements of a code of fair competition or agreement approved by the President under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, shall have been duly granted an exemption by the President or his designated agent. Any exemption granted under the provisions of this bill shall be made only upon the finding that conditions, such as an inadequate supply of labor or circumstances determined to be beyond the employer's control (in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President) in a specified industry or locality, make it impossible for the employer to comply with the provisions of the act. Further, no modification shall be granted for a period exceeding 90 days at one time, and no worker shall be permitted to work more than an average of 40 hours per week during the period of modification, unless such a limitation of hours will result in diminishing, instead of increasing, the total volume of employment.

Another very important feature of the bill is that section which empowers the President to impose an embargo, tax, or quota system on imports from any foreign country which, by long hours and cheap wages, can undersell the goods produced in the United States. This provision is highly essential in order that American industries be properly safeguarded and protected against the unfair competition resulting from low-cost imports of any foreign country. Any violation of the requirements of this act shall be a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, the offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense. The President is authorized to exercise any and all powers conferred upon him in the National Industrial Recovery Act for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this act. The act shall take effect 90 days after its enactment.

Mr. Speaker, it is admitted that among the many proposals suggested and tried for the relief of unemployment, the most substantial gains in employment have been effected through the reduction of hours of labor in the administration of the codes for the various industries. The theory of creating additional employment through the reduction of working hours has been proved successful by test, and in my opinion the establishment of the 30-hour workweek will stimulate employment throughout the United States and open up work opportunities to millions of those who are now hopelessly awaiting a solution of the unemployment problem. I am inserting herewith a copy of this bill—H. R. 2746—for the information of the Members of Congress.

A bill to provide for a 30-hour workweek to relieve unemployment, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared that a national emergency, resulting from the unemployment of millions of willing workers, has imposed upon State and Federal Governments a burden of unemployment relief and has interfered with the free flow of interstate commerce to such an extent that action to spread employment uniformly so far as possible has become essential.

SEC. 2. During the period of this national emergency no employee shall be required or permitted by an employer subject to this act to work more than 30 hours in 1 week, 5 days in 1 week, or 6 hours in 1 day by any single employer, or through employment by more than 1 employer; except under the circumstances and in the manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. Modification of the requirements of section 2 of this act may be granted to employers who have assented to and are complying fully with the requirements of a code of fair competion or agreement approved by the President under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, upon a petition for such an exemption duly filed with the President or any agent or agency designated by the President for that purpose: Provided, however, That such exemption shall be granted only upon a finding that conditions, such as an inadequate supply of labor or other conditions determined to be beyond the employer's control (in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President), exist in a specified industry or locality which make compliance with said requirements impossible without reducing the total volume of employment or restricting commerce or discriminating unfairly against individual employers or groups of employers: And provided further, That no modification shall be granted for a period exceeding 90 days at one time, and no modification shall permit a worker to be employed for more than an average of 40 hours per week during the period of modification, unless such a limitation of hours will result in diminishing, instead of increasing, the total volume of employment.

SEC. 4. (a) Every modification granted under section 3 of this act shall be made subject to the condition that the employer shall agree so to adjust rates of compensation that the average weekly earnings of employees for the hours of work reduced, as herein authorized or required, shall not be less than their average weekly earnings under the hours of work prevailing prior to such reduction, and such adjusted rates shall be applied to employment for any portion of the maximum hours of work so authorized or required.

(b) Any employer not conforming hours of work to the standards herein provided, or adjusting rates of compensation for the 30-hour week or any modification thereof, as hereinbefore provided, shall not be entitled to the exemption from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States, which is provided in section 5 of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

(c) The President is authorized, through such agencies as he may establish, to determine finally whether an employer has adopted and applied fair measures for the adjustment of rates of compensation in conformity with the requirements of this act.

(d) On his own motion, or if any labor organization, or any trade or industrial organization, association, or group, which has complied with the provisions of this act, shall make complaint to the President that any article or articles are being imported into the United States in substantial quantities or increasing ratio to domestic production of any competitive article or articles on such terms or under such conditions as to render ineffective or seriously to endanger any of the provisions of this act, the President shall, in order to effectuate the policy of this act, direct that the article or articles concerned shall be permitted entry into the United States only upon such terms and conditions and subject to the payment of such fees and to such limitations in the total quantity which may be imported (in the course of any specified period or periods) as he shall find it necessary to prescribe in order that the entry thereof shall not render or tend to render ineffective any of the provisions of this act. In order to enforce any limitations imposed on the total quantity of imports, in any specified period or periods, of any article or articles under this subsection, the President may forbid the importation of such article or articles unless the importer shall have first obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury a license pursuant to such regulations as the President may prescribe. Upon information of any action by the President under this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, permit entry of the article or articles specified only upon such terms and conditions and subject to such fees, to such limitations in the quantity which may be imported, and to such requirements of license as the President shall have directed. The decision of the President as to facts shall be conclusive. Any condition or limitation of entry under this subsection shall continue in effect until the President shall find and inform the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the imposition of such condition or limitation upon entry no longer exists.

SEC. 5. The requirements of this act shall extend to all forms of employment and to all employers in trades or industries engaged in producing, transporting, or distributing goods or services in or affecting interstate commerce; but shall not apply to agricultural workers or to persons employed in domestic service or to employees subject to the Railway Labor Act.

SEC. 6. Any violation of the requirements of this act shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof an offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

SEC. 7. The President is authorized to exercise any and all of the powers conferred upon him in the National Industrial Recovery Act for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, including the power to declare the end of the period of national emergency herein defined.

SEC. 8. This act shall take effect 90 days after its enactment.

LIBERALIZATION OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the liberalization of the Republican Party and also on the subject of adjusted-service certificates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio address on the future of the Republican Party, delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System on Thursday evening, November 22, 1934:

The unmistakable mandate of the recent election is that the Republican Party must humanize and liberalize its policies and leadership and make a direct appeal to the younger element by giving them real representation in party councils.

The Old Guard Senators were slaughtered at the polls because they refused to recognize the new economic conditions that prevail throughout the country and were either unable or unwilling to help solve them on forward-looking and liberal principles. There is an ancient saying that the Old Guard dies but never surrenders. Whether that be true or not the Old Guard, the reactionaries and Bourbons of the Republican Party met their Waterloo on November 6.

The immediate question now is what must be done to revive and reorganize the Republican Party in order to restore public confidence in its principles and policies.

The more liberal-minded States of the Middle West and Far West, hitherto strongholds of Republicanism, have been drifting away from their political moorings.

A liberalized Republican Party must come out squarely for a parity for farm prices, which is impossible under the N. R. A., and insist on an equilibrium between the products of the farm, the factory, and the mines. We cannot have a prosperous America without fair prices for our agricultural products, and prosperous American farms depend on the cost of production plus a reasonable profit to the farmer.

I have scarcely met anyone who does not agree that the Republican Party must be liberalized in policies and leadership; even former conservatives recognize the handwriting on the wall and are seeking front-row seats on the bandwagon. It will not require a major operation to have the former reactionary leadership move into a back seat. No ultraconservative has to be read out of the party. There is no need or room for personal attacks or impugning the motives of the Old Guard leaders. But if the old Bourbon leaders refuse to see the light—and none are so blind as they that will not see—then a major operation may be necessary, and they will have to be thrown out, lock, stock, and barrel.

I do not advocate or anticipate the necessity of such drastic treatment except as a last resort. Selfish interests, greed, and domination by wealth and special privilege, wherever it exists, must give way to a liberalized Republican Party before we can hope to regain the confidence of the people.

The only chance for the Republican Party is manifestly to come out openly and boldly for progressive principles within the compass of the Federal Constitution, steering clear of socialism, communism, Government ownership, regimentation, collectivism, and a huge superbureaucracy at Washington. Our appeal must be made equally to Jeffersonian Democrats and Abraham Lincoln Republicans to uphold and defend the fundamental American principles of Government, advocated by both Jefferson and Lincoln. The average voter, the plain people, of whom Abraham Lincoln said, "God must have loved them because he made so many of them", have no confidence, no faith, or sympathy in the old leaders of the Republican Party. The domination of the party by the extreme reactionaries and ultraconservative leaders is a thing of the past, and any attempt to revive Old Guard leadership or any element of special privilege that has exploited the party in the past means sounding the death knell of the Republican Party.

The party of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt, however, cannot and will not be silent while fundamental American principles and the very framework of our representative form of government are being undermined and gradually destroyed by the "brain trust" and other near-socialists at Washington.

There is no party today to speak for Jeffersonian principles except a liberalized Republican Party that will not pussyfoot and compromise with unsound, socialistic, and destructive features of the new deal which affect the welfare, the interests, and the daily lives of every citizen in the Nation, and will not tolerate the weakening of our constitutional and representative form of government. The United States Treasury for the first time in history has become part and parcel of the Democratic campaign funds, and such political methods are hard to beat.

For well over a hundred years Jeffersonian Democrats have battled for their principles without fear or favor until the advent of this administration and its socialistic and Santa Claus policies. Jeffersonian Democrats for all these years have boldly proclaimed their political creed which stood for the rights and liberties of the individual citizen under the Constitution, for economy, for State rights, against the centralization and concentration of power in the hands of the Federal Government, and the use of such concentrated power by the Federal Government to interfere with business or the rights and liberties of the individual. Every principle of Jeffersonian Democrats has been repudiated by the administration at Washington and trampled under foot by the "brain trust."

Abraham Lincoln once said he had obtained all of his political principles from Thomas Jefferson and the Declaration of Independence. The first two Republican platforms quote the Declaration of Independence.

Let us reaffirm the early principles of the Republican Party when it stood squarely for human rights as being superior to property rights and as Lincoln said labor is prior to capital. Let us build a bridge so that millions of deceived, disgruntled, and disgusted Jeffersonian Democrats may cross over to a liberalized Republican Party in 1936 and help elect a Republican President and oust the socialistic Democratic administration at Washington.

The Republican Party is not dead, nor is it dying, nor has it any intention of giving up the ghost. It is true that there are many defeatists within its ranks that cannot stand affliction and defeat. The storms of adversity like those of the ocean call for a high degree of courage, fortitude, and steadfastness. Adversity compels us to study and meet face to face problems that have to do with the very existence of our party.

I have no patience with those Republicans of little faith who are thrown into despair by defeat or suggest a coalition with the present administration. This is not the time for compromise with our sound party principles, which are more needed today than ever before. We are the party of opposition, the minority party, and we have a definite duty to expose and oppose all unsound, unworkable, and socialistic legislation. There never was a time in the last 80 years, except during the Civil War, when there was more need and reason for the existence of the Republican Party under sound and liberal leadership. It is beginning to become more and more apparent that it will be only through the sound principles of the party that business confidence can be restored and American wage earners put back to work. What are these principles? A firm belief in the private ownership of property and our industrial system based on private initiative and reasonable profit that has made for the wealth and the greatness of our country, and under which American labor has been the best paid, the best housed, the best fed, the best clothed, and the most contented and freest on earth. We stand, as we have always stood, for sound money, the sanctity of contracts, the protective tariff, national economy, a policy of abundance as opposed to restriction, want, and scarcity, and for the rights and liberties of the individual under the Federal Constitution.

I am not one of those who believe in harping on the Constitution. As Senator BORAH properly said, the people cannot eat the Constitution. The Republican Party understands that hunger is not debatable. We insist that no American citizen be permitted to starve or go without proper clothing, fuel, or housing. The protection of its citizens is the reason for the existence of Government, and is above and beyond the Constitution. It is unthinkable that in a land such as ours, that formerly produced an overabundance of foodstuff, clothing, and fuel, any citizen should be allowed to starve or freeze in this emergency.

I plead for a sympathetic consideration by the American people and the enactment by Congress of adequate security insurance for our wage earners, and thereby help eliminate the economic fear and dread from off the backs and minds of American labor.

A constructive program of industrial-security insurance should be adopted in order to provide our wage earners with adequate health, life, retirement, and unemployment insurance. Let us strive for a more equitable distribution of wealth and to establish human rights on a parity with property rights in the United States of America.

The biggest tragedy of the depression has been the forced letting out of faithful employees through no fault of their own on a day's notice, who have labored 20 or 30 years or more, often in the same firm, in building up the wealth and prosperity of the Nation, without any retirement pay to maintain their home and family. Such a situation must not be permitted to exist under our economic system in the future. It is not right, fair, or just to American wage earners in the greatest and richest industrial nation in the entire history of the world.

A liberalized Republican Party will stand without compromise for the famous slogan of Theodore Roosevelt, "A square deal for both capital and labor", and not a new deal based on unsound and unworkable socialistic experiments that destroy business confidence and increase unemployment. The attitude of the Republican Party toward private property is the same today as it was in 1864 when Lincoln spoke the following words before the Workingmen's Association of New York:

"Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself and thus for example assure that his own shall be safe from violence when built."

We believe in the sanctity of private property and oppose the extension of Government ownership and the creation of a gigantic and tyrannical bureaucracy at Washington, regimenting the daily lives of 125,000,000 free Americans. We do, however, favor and urge effective, rigid, and drastic regulation of public utilities and interstate electrical power under the Federal Power Commission to protect and safeguard the interest of the public.

In the words of Theodore Roosevelt, we demand that big business give the people a square deal; in return we must insist that when anyone engaged in big business honestly endeavors to do right that he shall himself be given a square deal.

Ours is a business country, and what is lacking is business confidence, owing to fear and uncertainties which hang like a black cloud over American business, small and large. There can be no employment of labor or return to prosperity until confidence is restored, and that can only be done on sound American principles based upon the experience and wisdom of the past.

All the administration has offered so far is Government ownership, State socialism, and general impoverishment such as exists in Soviet Russia in return for the destruction of American liberties. There are over 10,000,000 unemployed, more than at any time in our history, and 4,000,000 more on the Government pay roll; and it is estimated that there will be 20,000,000 receiving Federal relief this winter, and all this after 20 months of a socialistic Democratic administration at a cost of $15,000,000,000. And the worst is that the unemployment has been increasing every hour of the day since last May, all due to the incapacity of the present administration to govern within the bounds of reason and moderation.

The Republican Party to regain ascendancy must convince the average man and woman that it is not under reactionary or corporate control—that corporations and utility companies no longer count in its councils. While we must protect the rights of property in all just dealings, we must be free from any banking or utility control, and they must be administered for the good of the people.

"Victory is won by those who believe in winning. They conquer who believe they can." For once and for all let Republicans stop whimpering and apologizing; we have nothing to apologize for; we are still the party of sound principles, confidence, and prosperity in America. Twelve million Americans voted for these principles on last election day. If the present administration fails to solve the unemployment situation in the next 20 months, a liberal Republican will be elected by a large majority who can on sound and liberal principles within the confines of the Constitution.

The true epic of our times is not Upton Sinclair's California dreams and visions, but the right of free, self-respecting American labor to have a steady job and to earn high wages to support and educate his family and maintain his home without need of charity, dole, or public relief.

Let us reaffirm our faith in the early principles of our party as enunciated by Lincoln, in which human rights were the cornerstones and reinforced by the square deal of Theodore Roosevelt.

I know not what course others may take, but as for me—I give my heart, my hand, and my voice toward the rebuilding of a liberalized Republican Party that will serve the best interests and welfare of all the American people.

In the language of Daniel Webster, "Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country"; and in the words of Lincoln, "Let us highly resolve that a government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from this earth."

AN ANSWER TO THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER ON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD a letter from myself to former United States Senator Rice W. Means, now editor of the National Tribune, the largest veterans' newspaper in the country.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 1, 1935.

Hon. RICE W. MEANS,
National Tribune, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL MEANS: The President has again taken upon himself to tell the World War veterans that they are not entitled to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates before they mature in 1945, or to any other consideration. He went into great details regarding the original reason, purpose, and value of these certificates and makes out his case on the exact terms of the contract. It seems to me that the only contract that is sacred and the only one under the administration that must be kept to the last pound of flesh is that made with the World War veterans.

I do not question the President's right to oppose the so-called "bonus", but his tone and meticulous attitude toward World War veterans is aggravating and contrary to American traditions. There has been no misrepresentation of fact, and World War veterans understand both the merits and demerits of the controversy. When the President speaks of the fact that no obligation is yet due and stresses the terms of the contract, I am reminded of the pledges contained in the Democratic platform to cut governmental expenditures 25 percent, balance the Budget, reduce the number of commissions and Federal employees, and to preserve sound money at all hazards, and later on the repudiation of the gold clause.

I led the fight against the bonus in the last Congress because I was fearful that it would shove us off the gold standard, cause uncontrolled inflation, and increase unemployment. What has happened since? The President has deliberately taken us off the gold standard, has refused to balance the Budget, and the number of unemployed in his administration of less than 2 years has increased from 10 million to 12 million.

In view of the fact that the dollar has been debased to 59 cents by the President, and the cost of living has been increased at least 20 percent by acts of Congress and the "brain trust", I favor the immediate elimination of all interest payments on the loans made by veterans on the adjusted-service certificates, and unless this is done there will be practically nothing left by 1945 of the face value of the certificates payable at that time.

I have already offered a compromise plan of liquidating the adjusted-service certificates by making 20-percent payments beginning on July 1, 1935. This would obviate the evils of inflation and produce approximately $100 a year to the average World War veteran for the next 5 years. It would also be a direct relief measure, as over 90 percent of the World War veterans are in need or in debt. It does seem that in view of the direct gifts and subsidies to the farmers and other groups and the practical cancelation of the war debts by this administration that at least the World War veterans were entitled to some consideration in these days of depression and unemployment.

I take this occasion to state that the reason for the original Adjusted Service Certificates Act, with which the President had nothing to do and which I voted for, was an effort on the part of a grateful Republic to partially equalize the pay of our war veterans in view of the enormous wages paid our civilian population and civilian public officials, including The Assistant Secretary of the Navy during the war. It was nothing but a simple act of justice consistent with American practice since the foundation of the Republic and approved by George Washington on numerous occasions. The veterans had a right to believe, which they did on their return after the war, without a job, that they had been unfairly treated and discriminated against.

I urge the immediate enactment of the universal-draft bill so that in case of another war all wealth, industry, labor, and manpower will be drafted equally and that profit will be eliminated from future wars.

Bonus or no bonus, I am on the side of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, and United Spanish War Veterans as constituting the greatest force in the United States for the maintenance of our free American institutions as against communism, socialism, and subversive radicalism of every kind.

With kind personal regards and best wishes for the New Year, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

HAMILTON FISH, Jr.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM TENNESSEE

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein an address by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCREYNOLDS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the proceedings of the party caucus are frequently more interesting and of greater historical importance than much of the business of the House itself.

A signal instance is the address of Hon. SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, delivered in the Democratic caucus of January 2, placing in nomination as a candidate for Speaker of the House of Representatives the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this notable address, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of this Democratic caucus, the speakership of the House is the most powerful and most important of any place connected with the national legislative body. This country has been very fortunate in the character and competency of the men occupying this position, and to my mind one of the great reasons is that it has always been the custom to promote the majority leader to that of the speakership whenever a vacancy occurs. The majority leader of either party has to earn that position by his ability, his character, and by his familiarity with the rules and regulations which, to a great extent, has been acquired during his long service in this House.

It has been practically a hundred years since the State of Tennessee has been honored with a Speaker of the National House of Representatives. James K. Polk, who afterward became President, was Speaker of the Twenty-fourth Congress, and he came from Nashville, Tenn. During this same time there was another great Tennessean from this same city who was President of the United States; a man of courage and love for the common people, and "the chief apostle of Democracy", and one who will live forever in the minds and hearts of the American people. I refer to Andrew Jackson. His old home, called "The Hermitage", is only a few miles out from Nashville, Tenn., and is still preserved in memory of this great man; it is the "shrine of democracy", which people by the thousands visit yearly.

I come now to place before this caucus another man from this same State, same city, and same congressional district, as a candidate for your Speaker, the Honorable JOE BYRNS. He was born and raised in this district, under these environments, and practically under the shadows of the Hermitage. His district is known as the Hermitage district. As a young man he was a lawyer of outstanding ability, and just prior to being elected to Congress, he was Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Tennessee. The reputation that he gained while in that position to a great extent was responsible for his election to Congress. He has been elected to the Congress for 14 consecutive terms without any formal opposition since his first race. The reason for this is that his people recognize his ability and standing and the services that he renders. He served on the Appropriations Committee of this House for 22 years. For many years he was ranking Democrat on that committee, and many of us present remember that it was always his analysis made of a Republican administration that we used in our campaigns. During the Seventy-second Congress he was chairman of that most important committee, and his record was such that it reflected honor upon this House and the Government which he represented. Two years ago he was elected your Democratic leader, and no one could have performed the duties intrusted to him with a better record than he has. There has never been a peace-time Congress wherein more important and far-reaching questions were before this body, and JOE BYRNS, our majority leader, stood 100 percent behind our President. I am sure that the Membership of this House feel that he is entitled to this promotion of Speaker, and furthermore, he is going to be promoted.

He has been fighting the battles of democracy some 40 years and has been very effective for the good of his party. Some 12 years ago, when we had a Republican Governor and our election was on, we called JOE BYRNS back to manage this campaign, which he did most successfully. For the past 6 years he has been Chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee and materially aided in electing a Democratic Congress. If there is such a thing as a man earning recognition from his own political party by the efforts and money that he has put forth for that party, then JOE BYRNS is one of those men.

May I adopt the words of our deceased Speaker, Mr. Rainey, whom we all loved, and who nominated JOE BYRNS for majority leader 2 years ago, in which he stated, "He is the Abe Lincoln of Democracy."

He is ideally fitted for the speakership; calm, judicially posed; a trained parliamentarian; a thorough understanding of the procedure in the House; a broad statesman, and a thorough Democrat, both personally and politically. No judge on the bench would be fairer in his rulings or more considerate of the feelings and rights of every Member of this body than would he. I have known him for many years, and I know his family. His home life is ideal, and his good wife is capable of gracing any occasion.

The same State, the same congressional district, and city that gave this country Andrew Jackson and James K. Polk now give us JOE BYRNS.

ROLL CALL NO. 3

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. Speaker, I was present on roll call no. 3, but did not hear my name. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recorded as voting "yea" on that roll call.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we want to open up a thing of this nature at this time. Should we do so, then every Member absent at the time of a roll call could come here later and record his vote. It has been against the policy of the House. For this reason, I object.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the majority Members of the House that it is my purpose to call together at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning the majority members of the Committees on Ways and Means as a committee on committees of the majority for the purpose of filling committee vacancies. We shall consider first the filling of vacancies on the Committee on Appropriations.

Any Member desiring to have his name considered for this assignment will please make it known to the committee before 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I take it that it will not be necessary for the minority Members to be present?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is a matter for them to worry about.

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 20

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives shall be at 12 o'clock meridian.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for immediate consideration.

House Resolution 21

Resolved, That the standing committees of the House of Representatives and the floor leaders are hereby authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be actually necessary for the transaction of their official business during the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADVANCING TIME OF THE GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to a bill which I have today introduced proposing that the general election be moved up 1 month. This seems to be necessary because of what we know as the "lame duck" amendment. The effect of the twentieth amendment to the Constitution and subsequent legislation is to leave but 41 days between the time of the election of the electors and the meeting of the electors, which is clearly too short a time to canvass the returns and to have any opportunity properly to settle any election contest with regard to the electors. I am advised that it cannot be done in 41 days under the laws of any of the States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. While the gentleman is working on the "lame duck" amendment, will he not also attempt to correct certain other errors which may be grievous? For instance, there are but 5 days between the time the Electoral College meets here and the time the President is supposed to take office. We may sometime find ourselves without a President.

Also, the new Members coming here this year did not have a place to sit down because the old Members were not out of their offices. In my estimation, the first thing that should be done is to fix the date that Congress shall meet far enough beyond the 1st of January, and far enough beyond the end of the term of the old Members, so that the new Members will have offices at their disposal.

It seems also that nobody thought of the fact that the 3d of January comes only 48 hours after New Year's Day.

I think the astute Chairman of the Judiciary Committee can do a good job correcting the flaws in this amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The matter to which I have referred, of course, does not have to do with a constitutional amendment. The bill would go to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress. My purpose in making this announcement now is to ask the Members, if they feel so inclined, to take the trouble to look over the bill and see if there is any better way in which to meet the situation. I see no way of handling it except to move up the time for the general election. I shall appreciate any thought and study that may be given to this.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I said, Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a "lame duck" President under the present Constitution for at least 17 days. I do not believe that will be any more harmful than it was harmful to have "lame duck" Members of Congress.

I never saw any of them do anything different than during the time they were real Members of Congress. What would be wrong with moving that 30 days in the other direction, even though we have a "lame duck" President for 47 days and have a new Congress in 40 days ahead of the change of Presidents?

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I just conclude my statement first? I should like for the Members to think this matter over; and if there are any further suggestions than those incorporated in the bill, let me have them. May I say further that nearly all of the legislatures are meeting in January; and if anything is to be done about the matter, it ought to be done as early as possible.

I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Having mutilated the Constitution by this change, would it not be a good thing to bring a bill in here putting the Constitution back the way it was originally, so that it will work?

STATEHOOD OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to include therein a copy of a bill which I have introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following bill, H. R. 1394, to enable the people of Puerto Rico to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union of the United States of America on an equal footing with the States.

When General Miles landed in Puerto Rico in 1898, he met a hearty welcome from the entire population of the island who for a long time had felt the highest regard for the United States. The change of sovereignty was considered by all a most fortunate event in the history of the island, and, when, later on, in the year 1917, President Wilson signed the law which made Puerto Ricans citizens of the United States, the honor was accepted without reservations and with full recognition of the responsibilities, duties, and rights which it bestowed upon us. The loyality and sincerity of purpose of the people of Puerto Rico are far above any possible question. We have done our duty, and played our part in the sorrows and happiness of the Nation.

Puerto Rico has a population of 1,543,193 people according to the official census of 1930, or 449 inhabitants to the square mile, as compared with 40 persons per square mile on the mainland.

The population of Puerto Rico in 1930 exceeded the combined population of Nevada, Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, and Vermont, judging from the latest figures released by the Census Bureau. These five States together have a total population less than Puerto Rico. I desire that you bear in mind that Puerto Rico, not having a vote in Congress, cannot exercise the great influence which may be exercised by the representatives of the several States of the Union.

The influence of the people of the United States in the destiny of Puerto Rico has been, is, and will ever be uplifting, and the extension of the Constitution to the island represented a positive guaranty to the individual citizen of all national economic and social legislation and of all the political liberties convenient and favorable to the enjoyment of the people's rights.

We reject all formulas of a colonial government. We consider this formula disgraceful and not compatible with the civil dignity of our Nation, and, therefore, we proclaim the permanent union of the people of Puerto Rico on an equal footing with the people of the United States to maintain and consecrate economically, socially, politically, and industrially a democratic community with the same rights and duties as any State of our Nation. "We want, and are willing, to be recognized as an integral part of the States, and lead our future in that line."

Congress, as contemplated in the treaty of peace, granted American citizenship to the people of Puerto Rico and, under the Jones Act, created a political body and a civil government, composed of American citizens in Puerto Rico, owing allegiance and entitled to the protection of the United States. The island has now over 1,543,913 American citizens, and, for nearly three generations, our men, women, and children and the children of our children have been born under the American flag, and have been taught the American ideals of government in the forum in our courts, in our schools, in our entire civil life.

A resolution, adopted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico April 15, 1934, signed both by the president of the senate, Hon. Rafael Martinez Nadal, and by the speaker of the house, Hon. Miguel A. Garcia Mendez, in part is as follows:

Resolved by the Legislature of Puerto Rico—

SECTION 1. That the people of Puerto Rico desire that Puerto Rico become a State and be admitted to the Union under the same conditions as the States which integrate same.

SEC. 2. To request from the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby requested, legislation authorizing the people of Puerto Rico to frame its own State constitution in order to submit it for the approval of the Congress of the United Sates of America after it is ratified by the electoral body of Puero Rico to which it shall be submitted through a plebiscite for such purpose, the result of which shall be certified by the executive secretary of Puerto Rico; and the Governor of Puerto Rico shall give notice thereof to the President of the United States for the proper purposes.

Consequently, the bill H. R. 1394 was introduced, whose provisions are as follows:

[H. R. 1394. In the House of Representatives, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to enable the people of Puerto Rico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the States

Whereas it has been the intention of the United States of America to prepare the people of Puerto Rico for statehood as is evidenced by the several acts of Congress applicable to Puerto Rico and more specially by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, granting United States citizenship to the people of Puerto Rico, the first step toward that end; and

Whereas, by concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, approved April 15, 1934, it declared that the final status of Puerto Rico should be statehood and that the people of Puerto Rico desire that Puerto Rico become a State, forming a part of and associated with the federation of the United States of America; and

Whereas, by virtue of said resolution, the people of Puerto Rico desire to petition the Congress of the United States of America for legislation authorizing the people of Puerto Rico to adopt their own State constitution for its approval by the Congress of the United States of America: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territory of Puerto Rico, as at present described, may become the State of Puerto Rico as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. All citizens of the United States who have the qualifications of voters for representatives of the insular Legislature of Puerto Rico are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention in said Territory. Such delegates shall possess the qualifications of such electors; and the aforesaid convention shall consist of 39 delegates apportioned among the several representative districts within the limits of the proposed State as follows: One delegate for each of the 35 representative districts and 4 delegates at large to be chosen by said 35 representative districts.

The Governor of said Territory shall, within 30 days after the approval of this act, issue a proclamation ordering an election of the delegates as aforesaid in said Territory to be held at a time to be designated in the proclamation within 6 months after the approval of this act, which proclamation shall be issued at least 30 days prior to the time of holding said election of delegates. The election for delegates shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates of persons elected to such convention issued, in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein of members of the legislature. Persons possessing the qualifications entitling them to vote on the ratification or rejection of the constitution may do so under such rules or regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act.

SEC. 3. The delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet at the seat of the government of said Territory on the second Tuesday after their election, excluding the day of election in case such day shall be Tuesday, but they shall not receive compensation for more than 60 days of service, and, after organization, shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State.

The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Second. The State of Puerto Rico shall retain all the public property, vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits now ceded, transferred, and in possession of the United States, except such as are in the possession of and used by a department of the United States, and may dispose of the same as the said State may direct.

Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Puerto Rico shall be assumed and paid by said State and all debts and assets owed to said Territory of Puerto Rico shall be assumed and collected by said State.

Fourth. That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control.

SEC. 4. In case a constitution and State government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for its ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at a date to be fixed by said convention, which shall be not more than 60 days from the date of its adjournment, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution, and for or against any provisions separately submitted. The return of said election shall be made to the secretary of Puerto Rico, who shall cause the same to be canvassed, and if a majority of the votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, the Governor of the Territory of Puerto Rico shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with a statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. If the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form, and if all the provisions of this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State of Puerto Rico shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the rest of the 48 States from and after the date of said proclamation.

SEC. 5. The sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for defraying the expenses of the elections provided for in this act and of the convention, and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislature of the Territory of Puerto Rico, and the disbursements of the money appropriated by this section shall be made by the secretary of the Territory of Puerto Rico.

SEC. 6. Until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representatives, the two Senators of the United States, together with the Governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on the day of the election for the adoption of the constitution; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, and the State is admitted into the Union, the territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of the respective offices in said Territory.

SEC. 7. Said State when admitted as aforesaid shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the "District of Puerto Rico." The District Courts for the District of Puerto Rico shall be held one term at San Juan and one term at Ponce each year, and special terms may be held at such times and places in said district as the said judges may deem expedient. And the said district shall, for judicial purposes, until otherwise provided, be attached to the first judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for said district two district judges, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. There shall be appointed two clerks for said district, who shall keep their offices at San Juan and Ponce, respectively. The regular term of said court shall be held at the place designated in this act, at San Juan on the first Monday in January and at Ponce on the first Monday in March in each year, and one grand jury shall be summoned in each year in each of said district courts. The district court for said district, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties required to be performed by other district courts and judges of district courts of the United States and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, clerks, and stenographers of the district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation now allowed by law to officers performing similar service for the United States in other districts of the United States.

SEC. 8. The laws in force in the Territory of Puerto Rico, as far as applicable, shall extend over and apply to said State until changed by the legislature thereof.

SEC. 9. All appeals or writs of error taken from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Puerto Rico to the Supreme Court of the United States or the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, previous to the final admission of such State, shall be prosecuted to final determination as though this act had not been passed. And all cases in which final judgment has been rendered in such Territorial appellate courts which appeals or writs or error might be had except for the admission of such State may still be sued out, taken, and prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States or the United States Circuit Court of Appeals under the provisions of existing laws, and there held and determined in like manner, and in either case the Supreme Court of the United States, or the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, in the event of reversal shall remand the said cause to either the State supreme court or other final appellate court of said State, or the United States district court for said State, as the case may require: Provided, That the time allowed by existing law for appeals and writs of error from appellate courts of said Territory shall not be enlarged hereby, and all appeals and writs of error not sued out from the final judgments of said courts at the time of the admission of such State shall be taken within 6 months from such time.

SEC. 10. All causes pending in the Supreme Court of the Territory of Puerto Rico and in the United States courts arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States or affecting ambassadors, ministers, or consuls of the United States or of any other country or State, or of admiralty or of maritime jurisdiction, or in which the United States may be a party, or between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants from different States; and in all cases where there is a controversy between citizens of said Territory prior to admission and citizens of different States, or between citizens of different States, or between a citizen of any State and citizens or subjects of any foreign state or country, and in which cases of diversity of citizenship there shall be more than $2,000 in controversy exclusive of interest and costs, shall be transferred to the proper United States district court for final disposition: Provided, That said transfer shall not be made in any case where the United States is not a party except on application of one of the parties in court in which the cause is pending, at or before the second term of such court, after the admission of said State, supported by oath, showing that the case is one which may be so transferred the proceedings to affect such transfer, except as to time and parties, to be the same as are now provided by law for the removal of causes from State court to a district court of the United States; and in causes transferred from the appellate courts of said Territory the district court of the United States in such State shall first determine such appellate matters as the successor of and with all the power of said territorial appellate courts, and shall thereafter proceed under its original jurisdiction of such causes. All final judgments and decrees rendered in such district court in such transferred cases may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States or by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the same manner as is now provided by law with reference to existing United States district courts.

SEC. 11. All cases pending in the Supreme Court of said Territory of Puerto Rico not transferred to the United States district court in said State of Puerto Rico shall be proceeded with, held, and determined by the supreme or other final appellate court of such State as the successor of said territorial supreme court and appellate court subject to the same right to review upon appeal or error to the Supreme Court of the United States or by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States not allowed from the supreme or appellate courts of a State under existing laws. Jurisdiction of all cases pending in the courts of original jurisdiction in said Territory not transferred to the United States district court shall devolve upon and be exercised by the courts of original jurisdiction created by said State.

SEC. 12. The supreme court or other court of last resort of said State shall be deemed to be successor of said territorial appellate courts and shall take and possess any and all jurisdiction as such, not herein otherwise specifically provided for, and shall receive and retain the custody of all books, dockets, records, and files, not transferred to other courts, as herein provided subject to the duty for furnishing transcripts of all book entries in any specific case transferred to complete the record thereof.

SEC. 13. The courts of original jurisdiction of such State shall be deemed to be the successor of all courts of no original jurisdiction of said Territory and as such, shall take and retain custody of all records, dockets, journals, and files of such courts except in causes transferred therefrom, as herein provided; the files and papers in such transferred cases shall be transferred to the United States Distict Court, together with a transcript of all book entries to complete the record in such particular case so transferred.

SEC. 14. All cases pending in the insular district courts of the Territory of Puerto Rico at the time said Territory becomes a State not transferred to the United States District Court in the State of Puerto Rico shall be proceeded with, held, and determined by the courts of said State, the successors of said insular district courts of the Territory of Puerto Rico with the right to prosecute appeals or writs of error to the supreme court of said State, and also with the same right to prosecute appeals or writs of error from the final determination in said cause made by the Supreme Court of said State of Puerto Rico to the Supreme Court of the United States, as now provided by law for appeals and writs of error from the supreme court of a State to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 15. The constitutional convention shall by ordinance provide for the election of officers for a full State government, including members of the legislature, two United States Senators, and two Representatives in Congress. Such State government shall remain in abeyance until the State shall be admitted into the Union and the election for State officers held as provided for in this act. The Governor and secretary of said State shall certify the election of the Senators and Representatives in the manner required by law; and the said Senators and Representatives shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all the rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in Congress of the United States. And the officers of the State government formed in pursuance of said constitution, as provided by said constitutional convention, shall proceed to exercise all the functions of such State officers; and all the laws in force in the Territory of Puerto Rico at the time of admission of said State into the Union shall be in force throughout said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State, and the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within said State as elsewhere within the United States.

SEC. 16. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, whether passed by the legislature of said Territory or by Congress, are hereby repealed.

I want to express some thought regarding the progress made by the Americanization of Puerto Rico from a general economic, political, and administrative point of view. During the autonomous regime granted Puerto Rico by Spain in 1897 the island had as income for itself the royal tariffs, taxes on personal cedulas, disembarkment of voyagers, ecclesiastic bills, payments of periodicals, cedulas on privileges, and taxes on raffles and lotteries. The different classes of general taxes and others which were paid to the insular public treasury reached 29 divisions and numerous subdivisions.

The total budget of income during the Spanish autonomous regime reached the sum of $3,536,342.19. This total income of the insular treasury was spent in a great part for soldiers and marines, clergy, construction and repair of churches, and pensions up to the sum of $2,174,879.13. The other expenditures of the Government, such as public education, public works, sanitation, and justice, were assigned $1,361,963.06.

In those days we spent on public education, from funds of the State, $30,000, and the municipalities spent in education, through the Paulist Fathers, Jesuits, and Sisters of the Sacred Heart, $99,255. There were only 22,265 children in the schools throughout the island. The benefit of superior studies was granted to only 55 students every year. Under our present American regime there are more than 220,000 children in the schools, and they are not restricted from reaching superior grades. More than $4,000,000 from a budget of over $10,000,000 are assigned for schools and teachers.

Under the first year of our American regime the construction of the first buildings for public schools was ordered. We have already organized an army of 4,000 teachers who teach English and Spanish, and we use at present more than 2,000 buildings, constructed for graded and high schools, which are the property of the insular government.

When the old regime was changed for the American regime there were 157.12 miles of constructed roads. From June 30, 1900, to June 30, 1931, 1,859 kilometers of insular roads have been constructed and also numerous bridges and buildings at great cost.

Sanitation was organized for the first time in the island during the present regime, and the installation of a modern system of public-health service was inaugurated.

The insular government is composed at present of the following employees in the public service, including the Governor, the legislature, and the departments, who receive the following compensation: 6,011 Puerto Rican-American employees, $6,579,748; and 233 continental Americans, $409,585.75. Of this total of employees over 4,000 are school teachers and over 800 are police.

The judiciary of Puerto Rico has only four continental Americans—3 serving as judges and one as the attorney general. The police has only three continental Americans, and the executive government has three, including the Governor. The other continental Americans are mostly teachers and professors and scientific men from the Federal Departments.

In a series of decisions known as "the insular cases" the Supreme Court of the United States has clarified the present status of the people of Puerto Rico. We are an organized but not an incorporated Territory.

We hope that at the earliest opportunity, in considering the economic reconstruction of Puerto Rico, Congress will make a declaration that the ultimate political status of the island will be to organize the people of Puerto Rico as a State of the Union. Having defined this objective, Congress should give Puerto Rico economic cooperation by extending to the island all national measures with ample freedom of action to work out a program and reach the goal by the efforts of its own people. The words of hope and action of President Roosevelt should embrace Puerto Rico as an integral part of our Nation, and, I believe, he has this thought in mind.

The concentration of land into large holdings is partly responsible for a peculiar and deplorable condition with respect to the production of food crops. In the midst of a land, fertile enough to provide the most nutritive and fresh foods, the Puerto Rican is largely dependent on imported foodstuffs from the United States.

Puerto Rico stands today as the first best buyer of United States goods in all Latin America and the eighth of all the European nations. The fact that Puerto Rico has bought, and is continuing to buy, millions upon millions of dollars' worth of goods from continental United States is vitally interesting. It is estimated that Puerto Rico has purchased $2,000,000,000 worth of commodities from the mainland in the last 30 years.

In accordance with the last report of the Governor of Puerto Rico for the fiscal year 1933–34, the following enlightening statement was made with regard to its commerce:

Statistically the island had a good trade year with an external commerce of approximately $150,000,000, an increase of $19,500,000 from the previous year, while the apparent favorable balance of trade was $22,000,000. Of total exports to the United States, valued at $83,000,000, sugar shipments accounted for $54,267,000, while approximately 20 percent of the sugar crop remained in the island unsold. Island imports from the United States increased $8,600,000 over the previous year and totaled $57,500,000. During the year 2,834 ships entered island ports.

In view of the fact that agriculture is Puerto Rico's most important industry, the report on this subject has special interest. While there has been considerable recovery from the destructive hurricane of 1932, the Governor finds that other forces have held back agricultural progress except in sugar and tobacco. Sugar production increased almost 275,000 tons over the previous year, while the tobacco crop of 25,000,000 pounds showed a gain of approximately 7,000,000 pounds over the curtailed crop of 1933.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. GRIFFIN (at the request of Mr. FITZPATRICK), indefinitely, on account of illness.

FREDERICK LANDIS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 22

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. FREDERICK LANDIS, a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

CORRECTION

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. For the purpose of correcting the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, the Clerk tells me I am not recorded as voting on the adoption of the previous question this afternoon. I was here and voted "no." I ask unanimous consent to have the RECORD and the Journal corrected accordingly.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is the same request that was made by a gentleman on this side, and the gentleman from New York objected.

Mr. SNELL. No; it was not.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman stated that he was on the floor here and did not hear his name called.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I was present and voted. If there is any error, it is on the part of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

HENRY T. RAINEY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, within a very few days after the Seventy-third Congress adjourned the Nation learned with sorrow of the death of a most beloved citizen of the State of Illinois. He was a great statesman and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. I therefore offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 23

Resolved, That the House has learned with profound sensibility and sorrow of the death of HENRY T. RAINEY, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress.

Resolved, That in the death of the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY the United States has sustained an irreparable loss.

Resolved, That this House, of which he was a distinguished Member and leader, unite in honoring his sterling character, the ability, probity, and patriotic motives which illustrated his public career and the grace and dignity which marked his intercourse with his fellow citizens.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), pursuant to the order heretofore made, the House stood in recess until tomorrow, Friday, January 4, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1935

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 3, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar day Thursday, January 3, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its labors today it take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, late Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. FREDERICK LANDIS, late a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

THE LATE SPEAKER RAINEY, OF ILLINOIS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate letters from the Secretary of War transmitting copies of resolutions of condolence on the death of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, late Speaker of the House of Representatives, adopted by the Constitutional Convention of the Philippine Islands, the Tenth Philippine Legislature, and the Provincial Board of Ilocos Norte, P. I., which were ordered to lie on the table.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. NYE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence, on account of illness, of my colleague the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am advised that under the arrangements which have been effected it will probably be necessary for Senators to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives at about 12:15 o'clock. It is desired that the joint session be held promptly at 12:30. So I ask that the Senate stand in recess for a few minutes, subject to the call of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senate will stand in recess until 12:15 p. m.

At the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the joint session with the House to receive a message from the President of the United States.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms, the Vice President, and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The annual message of the President of the United States, this day delivered by him to the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress, is as follows:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, the Constitution wisely provides that the Chief Executive shall report to the Congress on the state of the Union, for through you, the chosen legislative representatives, our citizens everywhere may fairly judge the progress of our governing. I am confident that today, in the light of the events of the past 2 years, you do not consider it merely a trite phrase when I tell you that I am truly glad to greet you and that I look forward to common counsel, to useful cooperation, and to genuine friendships between us.

We have undertaken a new order of things, yet we progress to it under the framework and in the spirit and intent of the American Constitution. We have proceeded throughout the Nation a measureable distance on the road toward this new order. Materially I can report to you substantial benefits to our agricultural population, increased industrial activity, and profits to our merchants. Of equal moment, there is evident a restoration of that spirit of confidence and faith which marks the American character. Let him who, for speculative profit or partisan purpose, without just warrant would seek to disturb or dispel this assurance, take heed before he assumes responsibility for any act which slows our onward steps.

Throughout the world change is the order of the day. In every nation economic problems, long in the making, have brought crises of many kinds for which the masters of old practice and theory were unprepared. In most nations social justice, no longer a distant ideal, has become a definite goal, and ancient governments are beginning to heed the call.

Thus, the American people do not stand alone in the world in their desire for change. We seek it through tested liberal traditions, through processes which retain all of the deep essentials of that republican form of representative government first given to a troubled world by the United States.

As the various parts in the program begun in the extraordinary session of the Seventy-third Congress shape themselves in practical administration, the unity of our program reveals itself to the Nation. The outlines of the new economic order, rising from the disintegration of the old, are apparent. We test what we have done as our measures take root in the living texture of life. We see where we have built wisely and where we can do still better.

The attempt to make a distinction between recovery and reform is a narrowly conceived effort to substitute the appearance of reality for reality itself. When a man is convalescing from illness, wisdom dictates not only cure of the symptoms but also removal of their cause.

It is important to recognize that while we seek to outlaw specific abuses the American objective of today has an infinitely deeper, finer, and more lasting purpose than mere repression. Thinking people in almost every country of the world have come to realize certain fundamental difficulties with which civilization must reckon. Rapid changes—the machine age, the advent of universal and rapid communication, and many other new factors—have brought new problems. Succeeding generations have attempted to keep pace by reforming in piecemeal fashion this or that attendant abuse. As a result, evils overlap and reform becomes confused and frustrated. We lose sight, from time to time, of our ultimate human objectives.

Let us, for a moment, strip from our simple purpose the confusion that results from a multiplicity of detail and from millions of written and spoken words.

We find our population suffering from old inequalities, little changed by past sporadic remedies. In spite of our efforts and in spite of our talk, we have not weeded out the overprivileged and we have not effectively lifted up the underprivileged. Both of these manifestations of injustice have retarded happiness. No wise man has any intention of destroying what is known as the "profit motive", because by the profit motive we mean the right by work to earn a decent livelihood for ourselves and for our families.

We have, however, a clear mandate from the people, that Americans must forswear that conception of the acquisition of wealth which, through excessive profits, creates undue private power over private affairs and, to our misfortune, over public affairs as well. In building toward this end we do not destroy ambition, nor do we seek to divide our wealth into equal shares on stated occasions. We continue to recognize the greater ability of some to earn more than others. But we do assert that the ambition of the individual to obtain for him and his a proper security, a reasonable leisure, and a decent living throughout life is an ambition to be preferred to the appetite for great wealth and great power.

I recall to your attention my message to the Congress last June, in which I said "among our objectives I place the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation first." That remains our first and continuing task; and in a very real sense every major legislative enactment of this Congress should be a component part of it.

In defining immediate factors which enter into our quest, I have spoken to the Congress and the people of three great divisions:

First. The security of a livelihood through the better use of the national resources of the land in which we live.

Second. The security against the major hazards and vicissitudes of life.

Third. The security of decent homes.

I am now ready to submit to the Congress a broad program designed ultimately to establish all three of these factors of security—a program which because of many lost years will take many future years to fulfill.

A study of our national resources, more comprehensive than any previously made, shows the vast amount of necessary and practicable work which needs to be done for the development and preservation of our national wealth for the enjoyment and advantage of our people in generations to come. The sound use of land and water is far more comprehensive than the mere planting of trees, building of dams, distributing of electricity, or retirement of submarginal land. It recognizes that stranded populations, either in the country or the city, cannot have security under the conditions that now surround them.

To this end we are ready to begin to meet this problem—the intelligent care of population throughout our Nation in accordance with an intelligent distribution of the means of livelihood for that population. A definite program for putting people to work, of which I shall speak in a moment, is a component part of this greater program of security of livelihood through the better use of our national resources.

Closely related to the broad problem of livelihood is that of security against the major hazards of life. Here also a comprehensive survey of what has been attempted or accomplished in many nations and in many States proves to me that the time has come for action by the National Government. I shall send to you, in a few days, definite recommendations based on these studies. These recommendations will cover the broad subjects of unemployment insurance and old-age insurance, of benefits for children, for mothers, for the handicapped, for maternity care, and for other aspects of dependency and illness where a beginning can now be made.

The third factor—better homes for our people—has also been the subject of experimentation and study. Here, too, the first practical steps can be made through the proposals which I shall suggest in relation to giving work to the unemployed.

Whatever we plan and whatever we do should be in the light of these three clear objectives of security. We cannot afford to lose valuable time in haphazard public policies which cannot find a place in the broad outlines of these major purposes. In that spirit I come to an immediate issue made for us by hard and inescapable circumstance—the task of putting people to work. In the spring of 1933 the issue of destitution seemed to stand apart; today, in the light of our experience and our new national policy, we find we can put people to work in ways which conform to, initiate, and carry forward the broad principles of that policy.

The first objectives of emergency legislation of 1933 were to relieve destitution, to make it possible for industry to operate in a more rational and orderly fashion, and to put behind industrial recovery the impulse of large expenditures in Government undertakings. The purpose of the National Industrial Recovery Act to provide work for more people succeeded in a substantial manner within the first few months of its life, and the act has continued to maintain employment gains and greatly improved working conditions in industry.

The program of public works provided for in the recovery act launched the Federal Government into a task for which there was little time to make preparation and little American experience to follow. Great employment has been given and is being given by these works.

More than two billions of dollars have also been expended in direct relief to the destitute. Local agencies of necessity determined the recipients of this form of relief. With inevitable exceptions the funds were spent by them with reasonable efficiency, and as a result actual want of food and clothing in the great majority of cases has been overcome.

But the stark fact before us is that great numbers still remain unemployed.

A large proportion of these unemployed and their dependents have been forced on the relief rolls. The burden on the Federal Government has grown with great rapidity. We have here a human as well as an economic problem. When humane considerations are concerned Americans give them precedence. The lessons of history, confirmed by the evidence immediately before me, show conclusively that continued dependence upon relief induces a spiritual and moral disintegration fundamentally destructive to the national fiber. To dole out relief in this way is to administer a narcotic, a subtle destroyer of the human spirit. It is inimical to the dictates of sound policy. It is in violation of the traditions of America. Work must be found for able-bodied but destitute workers.

The Federal Government must and shall quit this business of relief.

I am not willing that the vitality of our people be further sapped by the giving of cash, of market baskets, of a few hours of weekly work cutting grass, raking leaves, or picking up papers in the public parks. We must preserve not only the bodies of the unemployed from destitution but also their self-respect, their self-reliance, and courage and determination. This decision brings me to the problem of what the Government should do with approximately 5,000,000 unemployed now on the relief rolls.

About one million and a half of these belong to the group which in the past was dependent upon local welfare efforts. Most of them are unable for one reason or another to maintain themselves independently—for the most part, through no fault of their own. Such people, in the days before the great depression, were cared for by local efforts—by States, by counties, by towns, by cities, by churches, and by private welfare agencies. It is my thought that in the future they must be cared for as they were before. I stand ready through my own personal efforts, and through the public influence of the office that I hold, to help these local agencies to get the means necessary to assume this burden.

The security legislation which I shall propose to the Congress will, I am confident, be of assistance to local effort in the care of this type of cases. Local responsibility can and will be resumed, for, after all, common sense tells us that the wealth necessary for this task existed and still exists in the local community, and the dictates of sound administration require that this responsibility be in the first instance a local one.

There are however an additional three and one-half million employable people who are on relief. With them the problem is different and the responsibility is different. This group was the victim of a Nation-wide depression caused by conditions which were not local but national. The Federal Government is the only governmental agency with sufficient power and credit to meet this situation. We have assumed this task and we shall not shrink from it in the future. It is a duty dictated by every intelligent consideration of national policy to ask you to make it possible for the United States to give employment to all of these three and one-half million employable people now on relief, pending their absorption in a rising tide of private employment.

It is my thought that, with the exception of certain of the normal public-building operations of the Government, all emergency public works shall be united in a single new and greatly enlarged plan.

With the establishment of this new system we can supersede the Federal Emergency Relief Administration with a coordinated authority which will be charged with the orderly liquidation of our present relief activities and the substitution of a national chart for the giving of work.

This new program of emergency public employment should be governed by a number of practical principles:

(1) All work undertaken should be useful, not just for a day or a year, but useful in the sense that it affords permanent improvement in living conditions or that it creates future new wealth for the Nation.

(2) Compensation on emergency public projects should be in the form of security payments, which should be larger than the amount now received as a relief dole, but at the same time not so large as to encourage the rejection of opportunities for private employment or the leaving of private employment to engage in Government work.

(3) Projects should be undertaken on which a large percentage of direct labor can be used.

(4) Preference should be given to those projects which will be self-liquidating in the sense that there is a reasonable expectation that the Government will get its money back at some future time.

(5) The projects undertaken should be selected and planned so as to compete as little as possible with private enterprises. This suggests that if it were not for the necessity of giving useful work to the unemployed now on relief, these projects in most instances would not now be undertaken.

(6) The planning of projects would seek to assure work during the coming fiscal year to the individuals now on relief or until such time as private employment is available. In order to make adjustment to increasing private employment, work should be planned with a view to tapering it off in proportion to the speed with which the emergency workers are offered positions with private employers.

(7) Effort should be made to locate projects where they will serve the greatest unemployment needs as shown by present relief rolls, and the broad program of the National Resources Board should be freely used for guidance in selection. Our ultimate objective being the enrichment of human lives, the Government has the primary duty to use its emergency expenditures as much as possible to serve those who cannot secure the advantages of private capital.

Ever since the adjournment of the Seventy-third Congress the administration has been studying from every angle the possibility and the practicability of new forms of employment. As a result of these studies I have arrived at certain very definite convictions as to the amount of money that will be necessary for the sort of public projects that I have described. I shall submit these figures in my Budget message. I assure you now they will be within the sound credit of the Government.

The work itself will cover a wide field, including clearance of slums, which for adequate reasons cannot be undertaken by private capital; in rural housing of several kinds, where, again, private capital is unable to function; in rural electrification; in the reforestation of the great watersheds of the Nation; in an intensified program to prevent soil erosion and to reclaim blighted areas; in improving existing road systems and in constructing national highways designed to handle modern traffic; in the elimination of grade crossings; in the extension and enlargement of the successful work of the Civilian Conservation Corps; in non-Federal work, mostly self-liquidating and highly useful to local divisions of government; and on many other projects which the Nation needs and cannot afford to neglect.

This is the method which I propose to you in order that we may better meet this present-day problem of unemployment. Its greatest advantage is that it fits logically and usefully into the long-range permanent policy of providing the three types of security which constitute as a whole an American plan for the betterment of the future of the American people.

I shall consult with you from time to time concerning other measures of national importance. Among the subjects that lie immediately before us are the consolidation of Federal regulatory administration over all forms of transportation, the renewal and clarification of the general purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the strengthening of our facilities for the prevention, detection, and treatment of crime and criminals, the restoration of sound conditions in the public-utilities field through abolition of the evil features of holding companies, the gradual tapering off of the emergency credit activities of government, and improvement in our taxation forms and methods.

We have already begun to feel the bracing effect upon our economic system of a restored agriculture. The hundreds of millions of additional income that farmers are receiving is finding its way into the channels of trade. The farmers' share of the national income is slowly rising. The economic facts justify the wide-spread opinion of those engaged in agriculture that our provision for maintaining a balanced production give at this time the most adequate remedy for an old and vexing problem. For the present and especially in view of abnormal world conditions, agricultural adjustment with certain necessary improvements in methods should continue.

It seems appropriate to call attention at this time to the fine spirit shown during the past year by our public servants. I cannot praise too highly the cheerful work of the civil-service employees, and of those temporarily working for the Government. As for those thousands in our various public agencies spread throughout the country who, without compensation, agreed to take over heavy responsibilities in connection with our various loan agencies and particularly in direct relief work, I cannot say too much. I do not think any country could show a higher average of cheerful and even enthusiastic teamwork than has been shown by these men and women.

I cannot with candor tell you that general international relationships outside the borders of the United States are improved. On the surface of things many old jealousies are resurrected, old passions aroused; new strivings for armament and power, in more than one land, rear their ugly heads. I hope that calm counsel and constructive leadership will provide the steadying influence and the time necessary for the coming of new and more practical forms of representative government throughout the world wherein privilege and power will occupy a lesser place and world welfare a greater.

I believe, however, that our own peaceful and neighborly attitude toward other nations is coming to be understood and appreciated. The maintenance of international peace is a matter in which we are deeply and unselfishly concerned. Evidence of our persistent and undeniable desire to prevent armed conflict has recently been more than once afforded.

There is no ground for apprehension that our relations with any nation will be otherwise than peaceful. Nor is there ground for doubt that the people of most nations seek relief from the threat and burden attaching to the false theory that extravagant armament cannot be reduced and limited by international accord.

The ledger of the past year shows many more gains than losses. Let us not forget that, in addition to saving millions from utter destitution, child labor has been for the moment outlawed, thousands of homes saved to their owners, and most important of all, the morale of the Nation has been restored. Viewing the year 1934 as a whole, you and I can agree that we have a generous measure of reasons for giving thanks.

It is not empty optimism that moves me to a strong hope in the coming year. We can, if we will, make 1935 a genuine period of good feeling, sustained by a sense of purposeful progress. Beyond the material recovery, I sense a spiritual recovery as well. The people of America are turning as never before to those permanent values that are not limited to the physical objectives of life. There are growing signs of this on every hand. In the face of these spiritual impulses we are sensible of the Divine Providence to which nations turn now, as always, for guidance and fostering care.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The Senate, having returned to its Chamber (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), reassembled, and the Vice President took the chair.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

STATE OF ARIZONA,
ELEVENTH LEGISLATURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THIRD SPECIAL SESSION.

House Memorial 3

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

The operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has been of inestimable value to the State of Arizona by helping worthy citizens to avoid the loss of their homes, relieving creditors of their frozen assets, making possible the payment of delinquent taxes, creating employment and trade through the making of necessary repairs to home buildings, and stimulating many lines of industry. This activity of the Federal Government has proven to be a most constructive phase of the recovery program.

There are still many worthy Arizona home owners who require assistance of the sort which it is the function of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to extend if their homes are to be saved. Some eleven hundred legitimate applications for loans have been filed with the local office of this Corporation but have received no consideration on account of the exhaustion of the funds provided for use by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Reports indicate that a similar condition exists in other States.

The situation is a critical one in this State, for private lending agencies have not yet seen fit to extend their operations to this field or to make loans on terms with which the distressed home owner can comply.

Wherefore your memorialist prays that legislation be enacted at the approaching session of the Congress extending the operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and providing funds for the making of legitimate loans to worthy citizens whose homes are imperiled.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house December 4, 1934.

W. G. ROSENBAUM,
Speaker of the House.
LALLAH RUTH,
Chief Clerk of the House.

He also laid before the Senate the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

STATE OF ARIZONA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
ELEVENTH LEGISLATURE,
THIRD SPECIAL SESSION.

House Memorial 5

To the President and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

Development of the vast resources of this Nation's waterways, to the country's enrichment, is an outstanding feature of the national administration's policy which commends our unstinted praise as a permanent policy no less than as an effective means of giving work in the existing emergency to many thousands of unemployed men.

The development of the lower Colorado River through the dredging of a deep-water channel from the head of the Gulf of California to the city of Yuma is a project which, since the earliest days of Arizona's existence as a Territory, has commanded the interest and excited the imagination of engineers.

This mammoth project, which would give to Arizona a deep-sea port, would be of inestimable importance to the Southwest and to the Nation, giving life, as it would, to the industries and multiplying the commerce of one of the richest parts of the country, and during the period of its construction affording employment to an army of engineers, artisans, and laborers.

It would appear that there could be no more auspicious time than the present, when progressive policies distinguish the attitude of a liberal Mexican Government, to approach the subject of an understanding by which that nation would consent to or cooperate in the construction of this waterway—an understanding which would be in full sympathy with the spirit of the Gadsden treaty, signed December 30, 1853, which declares that "the vessels and citizens of the United States shall in all time have free and uninterrupted passage through the Gulf of California, to and from their possessions situated north of the boundary line of the two countries, it being understood that this passage is to be by navigation in the Gulf of California and the River Colorado."

Wherefore your memorialist prays that the subject of this mammoth development be given your earnest consideration, and that the Department of State be instructed to initiate negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Mexico looking to the consent of the said Government for the construction of the said project over Mexican territory, or to its actual cooperation in such construction.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house December 7, 1934.

W. G. ROSENBAUM,
Speaker of the House.
LALLAH RUTH,
Chief Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Concurrent Resolution 19

A concurrent resolution memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to provide additional trained nurses for the United States veterans' hospital at Camp Stafford, near Alexandria, La.

Whereas heretofore 37 trained nurses have been stationed at the United States veterans' hospital at Camp Stafford, near Alexandria, La.; and

Whereas even that number proved inadequate for the needs of the disabled veterans of the World War under treatment at said hospital, the patient population of which averages 427 to 439 disabled men, many of whom are bed-ridden and helpless, and all of them requiring constant care; and

Whereas due to the economy measures put into effect by Congress and the President, the number of trained nurses at the said veterans' hospital has been reduced to only 31, a totally inadequate force for the number of patients: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana (the senate concurring), That this legislature urgently requests the President and the Congress to forthwith provide a sufficient number of trained nurses to care for the unfortunate disabled veterans of the World War who are now, and who in the future may be, patients at the United States veterans' hospital at Camp Stafford, near Alexandria, La., and to maintain a sufficient force, of at least 41 trained nurses at said hospital.

SEC. 2. That certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the clerk of the house of representatives to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress.

ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill that deals with lynching, and which is introduced jointly by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and myself.

The bill (S. 24)—introduced by Mr. COSTIGAN and Mr. WAGNER—to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES OF FREIGHT ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Federal Trade Commission be, and the same is hereby, directed to make an investigation and study of the activities of the freight associations of the United States and of the action of the railroads in jointly prescribing rates through such associations, and report the results thereof to the Congress as soon as practicable, showing specifically the action of said associations, especially in making rates between different freight territories and reporting whether or not such activities violate the antitrust laws as applied to the act to regulate commerce in the Central Yellow Pine and Tift Lumber cases (10 I. C. C. 505, 548; 138 Fed. 753; 206 U. S. 441).

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 4), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 5), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas it is alleged that the present rate system adopted by the rail carriers of the United States has resulted in higher rates per mile in some sections of the United States than others, notwithstanding efforts of Congress to make rail carriers a national system: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the present railroad freight rates with a view to determining (1) the relative investment costs and the value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the properties of class I railroads in the United States, separating such values so as to show the same in the various freight territories of the country; (2) the cost of hauling freight, or the cost per car-mile of the movement of freight, as determined by the Federal Coordinator of Transportation or from other sources, in each of the several freight territories; (3) the effect of making rates throughout the country and regulating, if necessary, the needs of the different carriers as was done in the New England Divisions case (261 U. S. 184); and (4) the methods pursued by freight associations and railroads in jointly prescribing rates. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subp na or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP OF FREIGHT RATES

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 6), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and the same is hereby, requested to make an investigation and study of the relationship of rates in different parts of the United States and report the result thereof to the Congress of the United States as soon as practicable, showing:

First. The relative book value and value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the properties of class I railroads in the United States, separating such values so as to show the same in the three large freight territories of the country.

Second. The cost of hauling freight, so far as the records disclose, in each of the said several territories.

INVESTIGATION OF "MORRO CASTLE" DISASTER

Mr. WAGNER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 7), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas on September 8, 1934, the steamship Morro Castle, within 6 hours of its scheduled arrival in the port of New York, was swept by fire at sea, with the loss of many lives; and

Whereas various investigations already held in connection with the Morro Castle disaster, when combined with the records of other recent maritime tragedies, create a prima facie case that remediable conditions exist which do not tend to produce the utmost practicable degree of safety from the perils encountered upon the sea; and

Whereas it is imperative that life and property be accorded the utmost attainable degree of safety from such perils: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is authorized and directed (1) to collect, collate, coordinate, and make available to the Senate the results of (a) the inquiry into the Morro Castle disaster conducted by the Secretary of Commerce through the Steamboat Inspection Service of the Department of Commerce, (b) the inquiry into the Morro Castle disaster, and the actions taken in connection with or subsequent to such inquiry, by the United States attorney for the southern district of New York, and (c) such other inquiries into the Morro Castle disaster and other maritime tragedies as would, in the discretion of the committee, be helpful for the purposes of this resolution; (2) to make such further investigations of the Morro Castle disaster, including the rescue operations carried on in connection therewith, as the committee shall deem advisable and necessary for the purposes of this resolution; (3) to investigate the adequacy and enforcement of the present legal standards of safety of ship construction and operation; (4) to investigate the prevalent methods and practices in the complementing of sea-going vessels, including all conditions of employment; (5) to investigate the adequacy and efficiency of the Steamboat Inspection Service; (6) to investigate whether the laws governing liability for loss of life and property at sea, the laws and usages of salvage, and the laws, usages, and practices of the business of marine insurance tend to encourage the installation and utilization of such devices and the promotion of such practices as are conducive to safety and to a paramount concern at all times for the preservation of life; and (7) to make a preliminary report of the results of its investigations as soon as practicable, to make further reports from time to time, but at least once during each regular session of the Senate, until it has completed its investigations, and to submit a final report to the Senate together with its recommendations for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the Committee on Commerce or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses until the final report is submitted, to employ such counsel, experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee incurred in the exercise of its privileges and duties under this resolution, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 9), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

DEMOCRACY OF JEFFERSON AND ROOSEVELT—ADDRESS BY JUSTICE GLENN TERRELL

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I deem it appropriate at this time to present an address delivered by Justice Glenn Terrell, of the Supreme Court of Florida, on the subject of the Democracy of Jefferson and the New Deal or the Democracy of Roosevelt, and to ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Aristotle classified governments as monarchies, aristocracies, and democracies; a monarchy importing absolute power in the king or queen, an aristocracy importing government by the privileged class or the well born, and a democracy or government by the people. None of these forms as observed by Aristotle had any such implications as they now have; neither has the method of the administration of their underlying principles been at any time static.

As a governmental concept, democracy has had many inflections and has experienced an unusual history. To the people of our country it is the flower of more than 1,000 years of striving on the part of Anglo-Saxons to establish and improve representative government. It emerged through the family, the tithing, the hundred, the town, the shire or county, the State, and the United States. In each of these political organizations, though sometimes suppressed, democracy was struggling for supremacy.

Law has been defined as a rule of reason whose object is the common good. It is promulgated by those who have the care of society. The great object of government is the order and well-being of society, and in its last analysis this object can be attained only when the multitude responds to the mandate of the law. Government, therefore, is nothing more than a means to an end, or the social control of individual conduct; the form it takes is not material if we may judge by the manner in which it has contributed to the happiness and good order of society. The tendency of enlightened society has been to democratize government regardless of the form it lives by.

At the time of the adoption of the Declaration of Independence only two theories of government were known to civilized man, that of divine right and the theory that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. The latter theory was adopted in this country as a democracy. In the various countries of Europe peoples equally as skilled in the art of government adopted the former theory under the name of monarchy. The democracy of Aristotle, of the Middle Ages, of the Reformation, and of modern Europe was different from ours and all differed as did the social and economic impulses of the period that gave them existence. A pure democracy was not practicable for us so we resorted to a republic, or that form of democracy administered through chosen representatives of the people. But change and adjustment have been one of the distinguishing characteristics of democratic government. If it did not, chameleonlike, readily adjust itself to the modes and aspirations of the races which adopt it, it could not survive the vicissitudes of a changing world.

The founders of our democracy were the ablest, best-equipped body that ever assembled in any country for a similar purpose. They were thoroughly schooled in governmental theory, ancient and modern. They were conversant with man's weakness to abuse power. They knew that democracies no less than monarchies had wrought their destruction through abuse of power. To the end that democracy in this country be defined, that it be not abused, that it be virile, strong, and eternal, it was incarnated in a written Constitution wherein its fundamental powers were delimited and safeguarded by a system of checks and balances. The powers of the National Government were in terms delegated and defined by section 8 of article I of the Constitution and the gist of the whole scheme as applied to the individual was embodied in a series of constitutional guaranties on which the entire fabric of our democratic civilization has been erected.

In what do these constitutional guaranties consist? Sanctity of contract, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right to life, liberty, and property, trial by jury, and the right to the writ of habeas corpus. To these should be added the doctrine of implied powers and the welfare clause. On these fundamentals our system of democracy must stand or fall. While the Constitution contains about 3,500 words and can be read in less than 30 minutes, only a very slight percentage of its phraseology is of interest to the student of constitutional law and government. The great body of our constitutional law is embodied in the opinions of the Supreme Court arising from the due-process clause, the commerce clause, and the obligation-of-contracts clause.

On this structure was imposed the democracy and political philosophy of Jefferson and on it is now being constructed the new deal or the democracy of Roosevelt. It is charged of the latter on the one hand that it is unconstitutional, socialistic, paternalistic, and communistic, while on the other hand those equally as able and sincere justify and uphold it on humanitarian grounds, under the doctrine of implied powers and under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Certainly, as applied to the subjects and methods of administering there is a wide difference between the democracy of Jefferson and the democracy of Roosevelt, but are these differences more variant than the social and economic order they were conceived to serve; and if not, is the latter vulnerable to the criticism leveled against it? Whether or not the new deal is being administered in keeping with constitutional guaranties must be determined by present conditions and not by those which were dominant in times past. Let us distinguish for a moment.

Jefferson was a strict interpreter of constitutional doctrines and was much exercised about local autonomy. He was rigidly opposed to centralized power and was greatly concerned lest the power of the States be weakened to the advantage of the Central Government. The democracy of Jefferson was cast to the requirements of a pioneer civilization of less than 3,000,000 people living in 13 States along the Atlantic coast, east of the Appalachian Mountains. Agriculture and commerce were the sole occupations of the people, Jefferson's idea being that these should be fostered and that the growth of urban communities should be discouraged. Under the democracy of Jefferson all our values were expressed in real estate and police protection was the only service the Government attempted to furnish the people. The steam engine, the locomotive, and the telegraph had not arrived, and the dynamo, the motor car, airplane, the Diesel engine, and radio were undreamed of. New York and Philadelphia were not nearly so large as Jacksonville, and it took more weeks to journey from the former to the latter then than it now takes hours. The vast empire west of the Mississippi was unexplored and had yet to be acquired by our country. There were less than half a dozen colleges in the country, no public-school system, no industries, no technological progress being made in any line, and little effort being made to disseminate the arts and learning among the masses. It was, indeed, the day in which pioneering was to the fore and the day in which rugged individualism under an economic laissez-faire policy experienced its greater development. The democracy of Jefferson was a product of this order and his theory was that it could best accomplish its purpose by a federation of compact States; that the powers of Congress should be limited to those enumerated in section 8 of article I; and that nothing could be added by the doctrine of implied powers.

As against the agricultural era of Jefferson, the democracy of Roosevelt must respond to the governmental needs of a vast industrial urban country; a country of more than 100,000,000 people inhabiting 48 States expanding from the Atlantic to the Pacific; a country whose frontier has been pushed to the ultimate and vanished, where rural communities have grown into great cities, and where great industries like the textile, the automobile, the railroad, the petroleum, mining, and many others unheard of in the time of Jefferson now give employment to millions. Developments in science and education have made the luxuries of yesterday the necessities of today, the standard of living has been raised, the telegraph and the radio have made the civilized countries of the world our next-door neighbors, London and Hong Kong are closer to us than Washington was to our fathers, and the Government is literally furnishing dozens of services to the citizen unheard of in the time of Jefferson.

The great problem of the democracy of Jefferson was that of political organization, blazing trails, and prescribing rules of conduct for a primitive society. It was the day of the pack horse, the sailboat, and the prairie schooner. It was the day in which national well-being depended on individual initiative and consequently the largest amount of individual freedom. There was no such thing as a problem of regulation, for the reason that the surplus population was continually advancing to the frontier before it became complex and the interests of individuals ran counter to each other. There was no such thing as a congested society, a crime problem, a tax problem, an economic problem, or a problem of readjustment. Business was confined within State lines, dual federalism was well defined, and the State was neutral.

The democracy of the new deal is confronted with the problem of industrial and economic regulation rather than that of political organization. Mammoth businesses affected with a public interest and which affect the daily life of the people as much as government itself are now subject to governmental regulation. The railroad, the textile, the automobile, the oil, mining, and other businesses that employ millions of people and were unknown to the democracy of Jefferson now require a major portion of the energy of the Government to regulate and reconcile conflicts among them and between them and the people. Changes in the social status through technological development which had no parallel under the democracy of Jefferson must be regulated in the interest of the public good. Transcontinental railroads, the hard road, the automobile, the telegraph, and the radio have for many practical purposes obliterated State lines, as a result of which crime, commerce, business, and international relations have become national rather than State or local questions. The welfare clause and the doctrine of implied powers, though incorporated in the Federal Constitution, have been invoked and enlarged to an extent never dreamed of by Jefferson. The passing of the years having witnessed such vast changes in our physical and economic status and the strain on government having been increased manyfold to regulate conditions growing out of the changes, it would be as reasonable to contend that our country could be governed now as it was in the time of Jefferson as it would to contend that the city of Jacksonville could now be governed as it was when it was known as the "cow ford."

So wide-spread has Federal and local regulation become that the liberty of the citizen is so restricted that he can hardly arise and breakfast without transgressing some new-made law. His eggs and milk are Government inspected; his milk cow, his hens, and his pigs must meet a Government test; his tea and coffee likewise; his automobile and his gas are inspected by the Government. His home is covered by a Government mortgage; everything that goes on his back and into his stomach is Government approved; his children are doctored, inspected, and educated at Government expense; the Government builds his highways and regulates his conduct when he goes on them; the Government interprets the heavens for him and gives him advanced information about the seasons; in fact, every moment of his existence is beset by Government service; yet with all he acquiesces, accepts the service, and complains that his liberty is taken. Such was the democracy of Jefferson and such is the democracy of Roosevelt.

Social and economic conditions control the course of government regardless of the form it takes. I have attempted very briefly to give you a picture of the phenomenal change in social and economic conditions our country has experienced. Bearing these in mind, it would be idle to contend that the democracy of Roosevelt would function as did the democracy of Jefferson, but the mere fact of change in the manner and scope of its administration is insufficient ground for charging the new deal to be unconstitutional and socialistic. The underlying principles of democracy are fixed and certain, they are dynamic, and though never static their saving quality is that they expand or contract to meet the demands of the social and economic order they govern. Such has been the saving quality of democracy through the ages. Every period in the history of our country has witnessed its democracy expanding to meet the demands of the times it serves. As to its latest expansion—the new deal—grave questions of constitutional validity have been raised. Not since Reconstruction have questions of such importance been before the country, and thousands are interested in and looking to the outcome of their validity.

The new deal is comprehended in the N. R. A., the F. E. R. A., the P. W. A., and other Federal boards and commissions recently created by acts of Congress in an effort to relieve the economic strain and the depressed condition throughout the country. There is a school of political thought in this country which contends that the State along with its other functions should now assume responsibility for the economic security of its people. I pretermit any discussion of that theory at this time. The question we are here concerned with is whether or not the acts of Congress and the Executive, and the vast expenditures being made under them to relieve the destitute, stabilize business, and promote recovery are in harmony with the fundamental principles of our democracy as expressed in the fundamental law. In other words, are the acts and commitments being done in the name of the new deal calculated to vitiate or destroy the sanctity of contract, or the freedom of religion, or do they tend in any way to throttle the liberty of conscience, the liberty of speech, the liberty of opportunity, or the freedom of the press? What can you point out in the category of the new deal that strikes down individual initiative, withdraws the right to trial by jury, the right to the writ of habeas corpus, or the right to have private property? In the administration of it has Congress or the Executive exceeded the authority charted for them in the Constitution? And, lastly, may the acts of Congress as comprehended in the new deal be clearly within the general-welfare clause or the doctrine of implied powers as contained in section 8 of article I of the Constitution? The answer to these questions is the test of whether or not the new deal is amenable to the charge lodged against it.

We have heretofore pointed out that for reason of technological development and the vast social, physical, and economic changes that our country has experienced, it would be idle to contend that the democracy of Roosevelt could be administered as was the democracy of Jefferson, but, on the other hand, in the administration of the democracy of Roosevelt, if we would endure as a democracy, it would be suicidal to abandon and cast to windward the fundamental and vital teachings of our faith. Changes in time and conditions do not change fundamental principles. Only the method of their administration changes. Sanctity of contract is no less essential to individual and national well-being now than it was when written into the covenant with Abraham or the day it was written into the Constitution. Strike it down and civilized society is paralyzed. It is the virtue in you which makes your word your bond; it markets the bonds of your city above par; lack of it markets the bonds of your city and country below par; it makes a Federal note an attractive investment at low interest; it gives you a line of credit with your bank; it brings your doctor without pay in advance when your family is in distress; it makes your grocer, your dry-goods man, your tailor, your shoemaker, your mechanic, your plumber, your butcher, and your druggist rest easy and forget you until the "1st"; it makes your lawyer and your preacher sing your praises; it brings your cook on time and makes her tolerant of your foibles; it gives you a standing in the community that no other virtue does; in fine, it makes you a full-fledged, valuable citizen, while lack of it makes you a liability and burden on society; and so I might continue ad infinitum to exhibit its importance in our social compact.

I might in similar fashion refresh your minds and parade before you the importance in our social fabric of freedom of conscience, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of opportunity, the right of property, the doctrine of implied powers, the scope of the welfare clause, and other fundamental verities, but time will not permit, and to a company of Civitans it would be a work of supererogation. To my mind, these principles are no less vital and sacred than they were the day they were incorporated in the law of our democracy; they are the pith of our faith; and you could as easily form a concept of democracy without them as you could Methodistism without the episcopacy or Baptistism without immersion, the Democratic Party without Jefferson, or the Revolution without Washington.

If it would endure, a democracy must conform to certain standards of moral and political excellence. It must have ideals and vision and strive to attain them. There are times when it must rise above selfish and personal considerations if it would foster the future and lasting welfare of its people. If it hedge and compromise on these, it does so at its peril; and if it abandons them for temporary expedients, its days are numbered. The founders of our democracy were careful to prescribe in terms these standards of excellence and pass them down to us as a heritage. My abiding hope is that we may perpetuate this heritage uncorrupted in our offspring.

I express no opinion as to the constitutional validity of the new deal or any phase of it. As stated in the outset, my main objective is to assist you to fairly appraise it in the light of democratic tradition and make up your own judgment. On the ground of governmental policy I think that phase of the new deal which is directed to economic planning is timely. In fact, I think the time is at hand for the Government to encourage such a service, but I do not think that the temper of the American people is such that it would stand for the restraints that such a service would lay on them if it would be generally effective. Heretofore the frontier has been the refuge for our surplus labor, businesses, and enterprises, but the frontier has vanished and hereafter we will read of it and the pioneer in history and story books. We have reached the point in the history of our democracy where we settle permanently to live and let live, to realize that the man next door has the same right to life, liberty, and property that I have. Heretofore we have been a nation of individualists only slightly effected by governmental restraints, hereafter by reason of concentration in industrial communities we have by force of circumstances become a nation of collectivists. Fresh from pioneer surroundings, we are chafing under the restraints and concessions to which we must accustom ourselves. In other words, as a race we have recently arrived from the forest, the brush, the prairie, and the wind-swept desert. From such an environment to a city block or tenement is too abrupt a restriction on our liberty. We are like a mustang recently subjected to the bit and saddle. Let us not topple the structure in our breaking.

An accurate evaluation of the democracy of Jefferson, as compared with the democracy of Roosevelt, must rest on social and economic differences. The complex industrial situation in which we find ourselves has produced antagonisms between capital and labor, carrier and shipper, producer and consumer, rail and auto and rail and water transportation, owner and operator, and master and servant in every line of industrial endeavor. Every session of Congress is beset with demands from these and other interests to reconcile the antagonisms among them and between them and the public. The matter of reconciling differences between these organized minorities or pressure groups is now the real task of Government, and it has become too much the fashion to approach them in terms of votes rather than on the ground of whether or not the demand made is in harmony with sound democratic theory.

The habit of approaching political questions in terms of votes rather than on the basis of sound democratic theory has, in my judgment, had a very unwholesome influence on the political ideals of the voter generally. Not only that, but as a vice its influence has permeated the entire social fabric, and its baneful influence may be observed in the workings of every social organization; even the church and the lodge have not escaped its evil effects. Overindulgence of the habit has enabled organized minorities to wrest from reluctant Congresses, legislatures, and councils concessions and subsidies that are in a large measure responsible for the unbalance in our economic structure.

In my judgment, some of the propaganda being advanced in support of the new deal is vicious and misleading. I refer to those whose inspiration begins by arraying human rights against property rights and in so doing stigmatize the ownership of private property as an unholy and a detestable ambition. A property right and a human right both have reference to the person. There is no such thing as a property right unconnected with the human aspect of it. You can by no system of logic or legerdemain disassociate the two. True, there may be instances in which the right of property has been abused, but no attribute gives the degree of security and stability to democratic institutions and goes so far to insure their perpetuity as the security that accompanies the ownership of private property.

There is another class of propagandists who take their cue by arraying one class against another. I consider them the worst enemies we have of democratic institutions. From the dawn of recorded history society has been marked by individual distinctions. The one-talent man, the two-talent man, and the five-talent man preceded free government. God placed His stamp upon him, and no rule of Jeffersonian or Rooseveltian democracy has changed his essential characteristics. The one-talent man is no less prone than he was the day of his investiture by the Good Husbandman to bury his talent. In so doing he fixed his status; he has his option to dig it up and put it to work at any time he desires, and in doing so he is entitled to all the encouragement and protection democratic government gives. He is not entitled to more.

I take off my hat to the two-talent and the five-talent man. In his brain our concept of democracy was originated. He has been the pioneer and the trail blazer in every era of our progress; he has fought our battles and dared to heed the dictates of conscience when the votes were against him; he has poured out his blood on the altar of his country's freedom, the freedom of his mind, his heart, and his hand have made our country great; he has given us the franchise and made us citizens rather than puppets and conscripts. I am for him and I think he is entitled to the gratitude of a great country.

If we may judge by the recent election returns, there can be no doubt as to our country's attitude toward the new deal. It seems to me that the principle of it must be commended. As to the manner of its administration, there is ground for honest men to differ. In my study of the new deal these questions constantly arise: (1) Are the things being done in the name of the new deal warranted under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution? (2) If not under the welfare clause, can they be justified under the doctrine of implied powers? (3) Should the contract clause be held as a restraint on the welfare clause when assuming obligations under the latter? (4) In spending billions of dollars to relieve distress are we in danger of imposing a burden on our children that they should not be required to bear, it being reasonable to assume that they will have their own distress to take care of? Should they be required to bear the burden of theirs and ours? (5) Are we in danger of vitiating the sanctity of contract by indirection? Many counties and municipalities in Florida have done so by the burdens they have incurred. (6) Are we in danger of imposing such a burden on existence that liberty and opportunity in this country will become empty terms, my thought in this being that business and endeavor must be assured of a reasonable recompense to insure its stability and continuance? (7) Character is balanced and stabilized through hardships; it is enervated by petting and pampering. No citizen should be permitted to suffer unduly; but in the administration of our scheme of relief are we tending in the direction of stabilization or enervation of character? (8) Does our system of relief and general administration tend to encourage or to stimulate individual courage and initiative? Being a member of the judiciary, I suggest no answer to any of these questions. They permit of much argument pro and con, and may be added to. I offer them as a basis for an open-minded quest into the merits of the new deal.

"OUT WEST"—ADDRESS BY HENRY J. HASKELL

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an able address by Henry J. Haskell, editor of the Kansas City Star, delivered before the New York State Chamber of Commerce in New York, November 15, 1934. Mr. Haskell, who is one of the best informed men on our section of the country of whom I know, took as his subject the farm problem from the viewpoint of himself as editor of the leading daily newspaper of the heart of America, with the title "Out West."

It is my belief that the Senate and the country are entitled to the benefit of Mr. Haskell's views on this question. They are the views of one who knows, who has the interest of western agriculture at heart, and who has also an understanding of the relationship between agriculture, industry, labor, and finance. I hope that every Senator will read the address, and trust that all may profit from it.

I send the address to the desk, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, I was properly impressed when I received your kind invitation with the dignified antiquity of this organization. I had no idea there was anything like it in this country. It took me back to an English friend who boasted to me that he was a member of the Worshipful Guild of Clockmakers, and that they had had an annual banquet every year for 300 years, including the years of the London fire and of the great plague, and had skipped the celebrations only in the 4 years of the war. Your organization dates back so that it is almost in company with these worshipful guilds of London, some of which go even farther back than the Worshipful Guild of Clockmakers.

I am very glad to have the opportunity to speak here tonight, because, as your president has said, our problems are your problems and your problems are our problems. We on the western farms are a great potential market for the goods that you make in the East. We have a great dammed-up demand for paint and hardware and furniture and clothing and radios and the other good things of life. So long as our purchasing power is paralyzed we throw men out of work throughout the East. Some of the men who are walking the streets of the eastern cities today are out of a job because the western demand for the goods that they should be making it down during the depression.

Carl Gray, president of the Union Pacific, once said to me that the Union Pacific expected to pay its running expenses out of its east-bound traffic, the farm products and the mineral products which it carried east. It expected to make its profits out of the goods which the farmers bought, which it hauled back to the West. So you can see, when this westward-bound freight is off, what happens to our railroads.

Let me get down to cases just to show you what happens during the time of depression. Two years ago wheat on the Kansas farms went to the unheard-of low of 25 cents a bushel. What did that mean? It meant that the farm woman who wanted to subscribe for the Ladies Home Journal, and who had been used to subscribing for it with a bushel of wheat, had to pay 4 bushels. It meant that the farmer who wanted to get a $30 radio and had been accustomed to paying 30 or 40 bushels of wheat for that radio, had to pay 120 bushels of wheat—the wheat produced by 10 acres of land. You see how that cramps the farmers' purchasing.

Another thing. As you perhaps have discovered in recent years, when we out on the farms are in distress and unhappy and cross we can make it very uncomfortable for the rest of the country. I think it was not wholly by accident that the inflationary amendments were added to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the famous A. A. A. These dangerous amendments were one result of farm unhappiness at that time.

Now, I have to confess I cannot come before you as an expert on farm problems. I say this in all humility, because I recognize the value of the experts, although I have sometime questioned the extremes to which occasionally some of the Ph. D.'s in the Department of Agriculture go, especially when I saw the logarithmic tables that were sent out to guide farmers in the production of hogs. [Laughter.] The farmers were baffled by these tables, as I was.

And that reminds me of the famous letter that Lord Salisbury, when he was Prime Minister of England and Foreign Minister, wrote to his viceroy of India, who had become alarmed because his generals had told him that the Russians were about to invade India. He wrote back in substance: "My Dear Viceroy: You listen too much to the soldiers. No lesson seems to be so deeply inculcated by the experience of life as that you should never trust the experts. If you believe the doctors, nothing is wholesome; if you believe the theologians, nothing is innocent; if you believe the soldiers, nothing is safe; and they all require to have their strong wine diluted by a very large admixture of common sense."

I have to confess, too, that I cannot come to you with the assurance that I would like—with the dogmatic assurance that all the policies of the A. A. A. are right or that all the policies are wrong. There are so many imponderables to be considered. The problems are so baffling and so complex that I have very great sympathy with the disposition of Lord Balfour as described by Lloyd George in his memoirs. He says, at war councils Balfour would sum up both sides with great lucidity. He would then lean back in his chair, gaze vaguely toward the window, and in a hesitant tone would say, "But if you ask me what course in these circumstances I think we should follow I must say I am perplexed."

So I come to you tonight not as an expert and not as a dogmatic prophet. I come rather as a missionary of a better understanding between the East and the West—a better understanding which would be beneficial to us both. Sometime I know that we must seem to you terribly unreasonable out in the West and often you wonder at the outburst of some flame of prejudice against the East, against the institutions of the East, and you don't understand it. You think, I suspect, if you are frank, that we are a crazy lot of farmers.

So tonight, to help give you an understanding, I want to tell you something of the background of the prairie West, how the present condition arose, what it is today, and something of the outlook for the future. I am going to ask you to make yourselves farmers for an evening. I am going to ask you to leave these delightful surroundings in the Waldorf—and to even leave Oscar—and transport yourselves with me for the evening out West, where you would find the newspapers and their market pages more concerned over the sales of livestock, cattle, hogs, corn, and wheat than over the sale of stocks and bonds. You would come to a region where the weather forecast is more than a shopping convenience. The weather is all important with us. It may determine whether Kansas from a given acreage shall raise 50 million bushels of wheat or 225 million, as was the case 2 or 3 years ago. So we in the West have considerable sympathy with the Kansas preacher who prayed, "O Lord, send us rain; we don't want no drizzle-drozzle and we don't want no gully washer. What we want is a sod soaker." He had to be definite about it, you see. And I shall ask you to transport yourselves to a country where you may hear city women, as I have heard Mrs. Haskell, say that what with worrying about the wheat all winter and worrying about the corn all summer, by fall they are completely worn out.

And, finally, I want you to transport yourselves for the evening to a center where the great event of the year is the American royal livestock show. It lasts a week and farmers drive in by the tens of thousands to visit it, and everybody in Kansas City goes because it represents our bread and butter and we know it.

Now that you have made yourselves farmers for an evening, that is not enough. You have got to get something of the farm background to understand the frame of mind of the West. So I will ask you to imagine that your fathers or your grandfathers were demobilized from the Union Army and joined in the great westward movement after the war under the Homestead Act. One thing that occurred to me as I was thinking about what I might say to you tonight was that this Homestead Act was one of our first conspicuous instances of national planning. We are talking a great deal about national planning these days, and I want to invite your attention to this conspicuous instance, because I think it illustrates some of the virtues and some of the vices of national planning.

It was an act passed during the Civil War, and I suspect you do not recall its terms. It provided that land from the public domain up to a quarter section should be opened free to settlers who would cultivate and occupy it continuously for 5 years. I am afraid some of you New York City farmers may not know what a quarter section is. It is 160 acres, which is a pretty fair sized farm even for the ordinary farmer in the Middle West. There were two objects for this legislation that our national planners in Congress had in view. First, they wanted to provide free land where the demobilized soldiers could make a living, and that was a very worthy motive. Second, they wanted to assist in the rapid development of the West, and that again seemed a very praiseworthy motive. They succeeded in forcing this rapid development, and it brought a train of evils in its wake, because we extended our farm plant far beyond the demand. That brought distressed prices and gave a blow to eastern farm-land values, from which, I believe, they never have recovered. I have been told that eastern farm land that sold at the end of the Civil War for $100 an acre has never sold so high since, and that was because we overexpanded to the West.

Of course, the one fundamental trouble was that we overexpanded our farm plant, but there was a second trouble. We attracted these settlers to the West into climatic conditions with which they were unfamiliar. They were in familiar territory when they crossed Missouri and Iowa and reached eastern Kansas and Nebraska. But from there west the rainfall rapidly declined, and the hundredth meridian stood as a barrier beyond which the rainfall became so light and uncertain that it was really a semiarid region, though a few years ago, I suspect, I would have been called a traitor to my cause if I had made such a statement. I remember, I think, Secretary "Tama Jim" Wilson's once making it, and he was jumped upon enthusiastically by the entire West. Nevertheless, beyond the hundredth meridian, about 300 miles west of Kansas City, you have a rapid decline in rainfall, so that for a long time this great flood of migration from the East dashed into spray on the barrier of the hundredth meridian.

Your pioneer hypothetical fathers and grandfathers who went west were, as I said, in an unfamiliar territory. They did not know how the handle the land. They planted the soft wheat of Ohio and Michigan that they were accustomed to. But it could not stand the rigors of the western climate. It was winterkilled and droughted out. They planted corn where the Lord never intended corn should grow and they found it out after a while. They pastured their livestock on the eastern basis of possibly an acre to an animal in regions where 15 to 20 acres were necessary. To do this they financed themselves by borrowing money in the East and they borrowed it at perhaps, nominally, 10 percent, but with the commissions it cost them from 20 to 30 percent. This movement surged westward in cycles of abnormally heavy rainfall and then was driven back when the rainfall returned to normal. The farmers lost their land and they naturally blamed the eastern investors who had been so unwise as to lend to them. There originated some of the feeling that is still being handed down against the East. I think you will find it in the traditions of farm families, where they feel that they had been unjustly dealt with, though it was partly their own, partly the investors', and partly nobody's fault, because nobody knew the uncertainties of the land they had taken up. Gradually they learned how to take care of themselves. They found there were Russian Mennonite settlers in central Kansas who had brought turkey hard red wheat from the plains of Russia, which were comparable to the Kansas plains. This wheat was drought-resisting and could be raised to advantage in Kansas. It made Kansas the great wheat-exporting State of the Nation.

The settlers learned where corn could grow and where it could not grow and they learned the enormous advantage of the drought-resisting sorghum crops that they could plant in the areas with light rainfall that would furnish feed for cattle. They learned how many acres it took to pasture an animal. So they had gradually adjusted themselves by the turn of the century and were doing fairly well. They were shipping to an export market. They were selling abroad about one-fifth of their wheat, one-third of their pork products, 40 percent of their tobacco, and 50 percent of their cotton—although cotton and tobacco are out of my field tonight. These agricultural products went to Europe largely in settlement of the debt service, for we were a debtor nation and used exports to pay the interest and principal on our debts abroad.

But, as I said a moment ago, the experiences of the 30 years from 1870 to 1900 left their scars on the frame of the mind of the West. The settlers were indignant over the money lenders in the East. They were increasingly disgruntled with the railroads because in those days the railroads were giving rebates. They gave them to business men who had enough freight to demand them, but they did not give them to the farmers, and the farmers resented the railroad rebates. They felt that the prices they paid were too high and they blamed monopolies. The great western political movements, the Granger movement of the sixties, the Greenback craze of the seventies, the Farmers' Alliance movement of the eighties, the Populist movement and Bryan's 16-to-1 of the nineties and the present A. A. A. are all reactions to bad economic conditions; some fairly reasonable reactions, others wild reactions. The inflationary spirit of the West had its start at the time when farmers were borrowing money at 20 to 30 percent. They felt—they were rather fuzzy in their thinking, but you can see it was rather natural of them to feel—that there must be too little money in the country when they had to pay these enormous rates. So they were for printing more money, and the Greenback movement got its start there because of this unhappy experience.

Now, that was the situation that had developed up to the turn of the century when the farmers, as I said, had become fairly well adjusted to their new conditions. With American resourcefulness they had conquered the wilderness and had settled it, and gradually domestic demand, coupled with the foreign demand, had risen to their productive capacity.

Then came the World War with its tremendous distortions of everything, including the farm plant, from the results of which we are still suffering. I don't know that you understand to what an extent the war affected the farm plant. The Allies appealed to us for wheat. Everybody was called on to plant wheat and our farmers expanded their acreage from 50,000,000 acres—I won't use many figures this evening, but I think these are interesting figures—to 75,000,000 acres in 1919. There was a wheat acreage expansion that was equal to about twice the normal wheat acreage of Kansas, which, as I said, is our leading wheat exporting State. Of course, with the high prices boosting land values, farmers in all parts of the country, especially in northwest Missouri and in Iowa and in Illinois, engaged in disastrous land speculation. They bought too much high-priced land, and a great many of them were hooked by it. But I believe that speculative disasters of that sort were not unknown in the rest of the country during that same decade. [Laughter.]

Well, in 1920, at the end of the war, there came the first collapse, and farm prices took a nose dive. They went much farther than the prices of manufactured goods, so that the old parity to which the farmer looks back as the golden age, when he could exchange 1 bushel of wheat for a subscription to the Ladies' Home Journal and 30 bushels of wheat for a $30 radio—that parity was gone and has never since been restored. But the difficulty here was much more fundamental than any of us, I suppose, realized at the time, at least any effective number of us; because, as you know, the United States had been transformed from a debtor nation to a creditor nation, and we never got the creditor-nation psychology.

Of course, it was indicated that at that time we should have lowered our tariffs to make it possible for the foreigners to pay their debt service and to buy our export stuffs, our manufactured goods, and our wheat and lard and pork and tobacco and cotton. Instead we hiked the tariff in 1922 and then we gave it a final boost in 1930, and I take off my hat to the smartness of the gentleman who could put that over on an exporting industry and make the victims like it; make it appear they were giving the farmer protection on his wheat, a fifth of which he was exporting, and make him think they were giving him a duty which would help him on pork products, when he was exporting 30 percent of his pork products. Nevertheless, they put it over, and I think this was partly due to the fact that out through the prairie West the farmers were largely descendants of Union soldiers. So they had great affection and respect for the Republican Party; and when they sang "John Brown's Body" at a political meeting, they shouted "Hurrah for the Republican Party", because it was the G. O. P. that had saved the Union, and so the tariff was sanctified.

In 1930 we gave the final boost without thought to the effect on our foreign trade. So far as I remember, Cordell Hull, in his minority report on the bill, furnished the only discussion of the effect of the duties on foreign trade. That report was immediately forgotten. I listened to an interminable number of debates in Congress on the Hawley-Smoot bill. I do not think I heard the matter referred to once. I do not think I heard anybody consider what effect raising duties would have on our export trade, on the stuff we were sending abroad, or on our debt service. It seems to me the debate was just about on the intellectual level of the jeweler in Kansas City, who sold our office boy a $125 diamond ring without thinking of how he was going to get paid for it—no; I do the jeweler an injustice; he was able to get his ring back. [Laughter.]

But for a time the situation was masked for us because private lending took up the burden that the Government lending had laid down. The growing tourist trade helped out, and prosperity reached a point where we could still buy without regard very much to the tariff walls. By the middle of the last decade we were selling $2,000,000,000 worth of farm products abroad and had quite a satisfactory foreign trade, though the farm distress really was increasing, because we were accumulating high taxes and high interest charges, since we had bought a lot of the new-fangled machinery for our farms, and we had gone rather heavily in debt, as we always do in periods of prosperity; and we had been increasing the cost of government in various ways. So when the lending stopped in 1929 and the crash came the farm industry had to stand the double shock that every export industry was subject to, of a combined loss of the domestic market and of the foreign market. That was the shock that the export industries had to stand, that the domestic industries partly escaped—the collapse of the foreign as well as the domestic market—and the farmers were left with these unmanageable surpluses on their hands that they had been exporting.

Now, you naturally ask why the farmers didn't stop piling up surpluses; why they went on planting. That is a natural question. Under normal conditions the farmer would have adjusted himself. I have spoken of the time when we expanded our wheat acreage to 75,000,000 acres. We reduced that to 50,000,000 acres in 6 years without any Government intervention. The farmer did this himself under the influence of low prices. He let some of his land go back into pastures, and he let some lie fallow. But these were not normal conditions in 1929, because, as I said, the farmer had gone more heavily in debt, more heavily in debt than he should, just as the rest of us did, and at the same time he had built fine rural schools for his children and had tried to take a share of the general advantages of civilization. His taxes were very high.

Now, when you have taxes and interest to meet and you have a very small cash income—and if you will study the figures you will find that farmers under the best of circumstances have a considerably smaller income than other gainfully employed persons—you feel you have to cultivate every last acre of land you have in order to get money to meet your debts and taxes. That kept up the surpluses, you see. The farmer was under such pressure that no matter if prices were ruinously low the only way to get more money to pay his taxes and his debts was to cultivate more land. His overhead would not let him stop the operation of his plant as the manufacturing industries stopped the operation of their plants.

Then he was the victim of demagogues who held out the beautiful mirage that Uncle Sam was the miracle worker who would produce higher prices for him. That began to be preached generally through the Middle West. Of course, a good many farmers fell for the fallacy of that doctrine. They expanded their wheat acreage, for instance, about 10,000,000 acres in the 5 years after 1925, though they should not have done it. But the farmers believed they were going to get higher prices.

Here again national planning came in. Some of the experts in the Department of Agriculture, when the price of wheat began to slump, assured the Farm Board that the statistical position of world wheat indicated that the price was really below what it should be and that after this flurry was over it would go back, so that the Farm Board would be quite justified in pegging the price at the then level. Well, it proved to be not a flurry but a hurricane. The experts were wrong, and by and by, after the Farm Board was swamped with wheat and started to crawl out from under this enormous mountain of wheat they had accumulated, they left the wheat price below the level that it had reached in Elizabethan England, which was something inconceivable to us in the West.

When the new administration came in it faced a very, very difficult situation. There were foreclosures of farm mortgages. You began to hear of farm strikes and of forceable resistance to foreclosures. There was great distress. The farmer was faced in many cases with losing his life's savings and his home, and also his source of livelihood, and he was faced in some instances with deficiency judgments. I will say in this presence that the insurance companies did mighty well by the farmers at that time, and I believe their attitude was appreciated. The insurance companies did not ask for deficiency judgments, though there were some lenders who did. So the farmer was not only faced with losing everything he had, but with mortgaging his future on a deficiency judgment so that he could never get on his feet. Of course, some farmers were desperate.

But they certainly had an exaggerated idea in Washington, and I believe you had throughout the East, of the danger of armed resistance. There was never any danger of any agrarian revolution. The farmer is not a revolutionist. These sporadic outbreaks were far less than the outbreaks you have in any major strike in the East. Revolutions by violence are urban revolutions, not farm revolutions. The farmer in general is a political animal. He began to talk about the Frazier bill and having the Government finance his mortgages by printing money. He was willing to take his chances with political action, but not with the shotgun. The farmer is of the backbone of the social structure. He is not a revolutionist. [Applause.]

In this situation I believe it would have been economically unsound for the administration to adopt a let-alone policy and certainly it was politically impossible. The farmers expected something to be done and I believe it is fortunate for the country that they found in President Roosevelt a sympathetic listener and in Secretary Wallace a high-minded, candid, and idealistic man to carry out policies. In spite of any mistakes and any disagreement we may have with the policies, I believe that those statements still stand—and I am not in full agreement with the policies, as I shall show in a moment.

I am not going into details, but there were two major efforts. One was to relieve the debt burden through Government credit agencies. The second was to raise prices by curtailing production. The first policy of relieving the debt burden I think has been a magnificent success in spite of some objections I can see to it. Some 700,000 farm families have been aided at a cost of about $2,000,000,000, most of which has been supplied by private investors, and 90 percent of this money has gone into refinancing farm mortgages, not into new ones. Also the debt burden has been greatly lightened. This has had the effect of reducing the feeling of unrest and also reducing inflation sentiment. The talk of inflation is not ended in the West, but it has been very much checked.

The questionable part, I think, lies in the crop-reduction program of the A. A. A. This is financed, as you know, by processing taxes that this year will produce perhaps $800,000,000. So long as we subsidize the protected industries at the expense of the consumers, I cannot agree that it is unfair to subsidize the farmers at the expense of the consumers through processing taxes. The processing tax is the farmers' tariff. I am not enthusiastic over high tariffs or the processing taxes, but I do feel that they are on all fours. Also, I am cold to the argument that it is rather terrible for the farmer to cut down on his food production and in some cases destroy food. I think he has as much right to curtail production as the shoe manufacturer has. We have had a lot of fun lately reading a letter that has been going around. It is supposed to be the letter of a man who wants to go into the business of being paid for not raising hogs, who wants to know the best strain not to raise, and the location of the best farm not to raise hogs on. That is all good fun. But, after all, the question is as to the most practical way of getting the farm plant back on a normal basis. It was on an abnormal basis partly through Government action on tariffs, and I think it could be argued that the Government may properly help the farmer get on a normal basis.

The fundamental question, I think, goes deeper than this. It goes back to whether a board in Washington in the long run can more effectively determine what the farmer can raise than the farmer himself can determine. After all it is the old argument between national planning and individual initiative. The farmer has accepted the relief part of the program with gratitude. He is glad to have the benefit payments. In many instances he would have been on relief if it had not been for these. He was especially hard up from the drought, which was the great catastrophe to the trans-Mississippi country. At the same time our impression from the Kansas City Star's farm weekly and from our contact with the farmers is that the farmer who is glad to take the money is still skeptical over the soundness of the program and whether in the long run it will produce the results hoped for. One farmer said to me, "We managed our farm production pretty well for a good many years without governmental interference, and I believe we could do it again." The thing has not been tested out yet. The drought much more than any particular program took care of the surplus this year. We do not know whether in the years to come the land that is taken out of wheat production, for instance, through contracts with the Government will be duplicated by new land that is brought in. We have not the experience yet to show that, but there is a considerable danger of it, a considerable danger of the program's proving ineffectual, unless we go to lengths to which Secretary Wallace would very much hesitate to go.

The comment of one farmer I think sums up the situation graphically. He said that from his standpoint the trouble with the Government program was that it had too much hay on the ground. I do not know whether you Wall Street farmers get the force of this expression. If any of you came from a farm, you know that getting in the hay is a very ticklish matter; that you have to cut it when it is ripe and you cannot cut too much, because there is always the danger that the rain will come along and destroy it. The Government, he said, had too much hay on the ground—by which he meant the Government had undertaken more than it could accomplish. That seems to suggest a major objection to this program—the question whether the program can be made to work.

Briefly I may suggest there are alternatives. I cannot discuss them at any length, but I have said that the pressure of the debt and the interest charges forced the farmer to expand his production when he knew it was unwise to do so. If he is relieved, as he has been, of the great pressure of his debt charges, and if we can relieve him further of his taxes—and States are doing that, and it is mostly a State matter, because it is the local tax on land that weighs heaviest on the farmer—if those two things can be taken care of, I believe the farmer could be depended upon to handle his production in a way that would produce a much more efficient food plant for the country than a board at Washington can achieve by directing the farmer as to the use of his land. After all, the farmer feels he knows better how to run his farm than the Government does, and I suspect he is pretty nearly right in that. [Applause.]

Now, I do not want to leave you with too gloomy a picture of the farm situation. There is this gloom to it. We need have no illusions. Whether we reduce our production voluntarily or by Government action, we must suffer for it. If we do not get back our foreign markets, we have got to take from fifty to sixty million acres of good land out of production because we were using that amount for the export trade. If we take that out of production, we not only give a terrific shock to the farm industry but we affect the railroads. We affect great grain centers and packing centers and every industry that handles farm commodities. So we should not kid ourselves. If we do not get these foreign markets back and are not ready to buy foreign goods as well as to sell them and get our tariff barriers down, we are not going to get back to our old standard of living so far as the farm is concerned; and I think you are interested here in the East in getting us back, if for no other reason than so that we can buy your products. I think that is a great problem there. We might have made a start in the right direction at the London Conference, but that is water over the dam. We have President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull, with Secretary Wallace's cooperation, trying to negotiate reciprocal treaties which will help to get these foreign markets back to the advantage of all of us.

Still, even ignoring foreign markets, the picture is not one, as I said of unrelieved gloom. We have 2,000,000,000 more of farm income this year, including the Government payments, than we had 2 years ago, and the effect has been evident in the revival of retail trade; because as soon as the farmer gets money beyond his expenses and taxes he spends money in your part of the country to buy goods. So the condition is considerably better than it was. We have gone through the most terrific drought in the history of the trans-Mississippi country. It looked for a time like a national calamity. Our pastures were burned up, we had no water for our stock, we had to sacrifice our animals, and we had to get down to brass tacks in the way of living. But when the September rains came and things began to green up and the forage crops began to come, the old courage of the West revived and we could take stock and see that we had some real advantages from the drought. First, it had put our great surpluses of wheat and cotton and corn through the wringer. In one season it had done more than the Government could have done in years in reducing our surpluses. We had culled our herds of the undesirable stock and we had better herds left than we had to start with. So the farm plant has never been more economically sound than it is today. It is ready to move forward and make money on any revival of trade.

Here is where you come in. While I cannot profess to speak with assurance on this subject, certainly the last election showed overwhelmingly where the country stands. With our knowledge that the administration undoubtedly has learned and profited by the experience of the last year, and that the President is just as much concerned with the revival of business as you and I are, it seems to me it is up to us to stop worrying, get down to business and cooperate so far as possible to bring back that prosperity which we all desire and which will relieve the pressure for further experimentation and excessive spending. I believe the farm industry is in shape to respond to any improvement. When this improvement comes we can sell you more farm stuff and then we will buy more goods from you.

One last word. The farmer is a typical American, a strong, self-reliant individualist. He follows false gods at times, as most of the rest of us do, but he is essentially conservative, essentially a strong bulwark of the American social structure. I wish you could have taken a drive that I took not long ago out into Kansas to talk with farmers. You would have been impressed as I was with the intelligence and shrewdness of their comments. They are not the farmers of the cartoons. They are shrewd, intelligent Americans, and their wives are women who have done wonders during the depression, keeping the families going and maintaining morale. In their community meetings they have got the farmers and their wives together to discuss not only farm problems but all current affairs, literature, and such. It is a real intellectual life that goes on on the farm today with modern means of communication. You would have found great diversity of opinion on various policies, as I did. You would have found some farmers believing that the emergency measures the Government took were justified, some dissenting. But you would have found them all restive under the proposal that the measures be made permanent, with the Government continuing to tell them how to use their land.

Some of the older men were disturbed, too, over what they felt was the effect of the Government policies on the self-reliant character of the farmers. They felt it was a real danger that the farmer should depend so much on the Government. I remember vividly one stalwart old farmer. He said his father had come to Kansas in '57 from Massachusetts.

"My idea of this situation is summed up in this story", he said. "I had a crippled friend. He walked with crutches. One day when he came to town he slipped on the street and fell and his crutches flew beyond his reach. People rushed up to help, but he waved them away. 'Stand back, gentlemen', he said; 'I can help myself.' He crawled over and got his crutches. He got them under his arms and finally struggled to his feet. It was painful, it was tedious, but he kept his self-respect."

Now, this was in a country that had been seared by the drought of the summer, with the pastures and the gardens burned up. The farmers had had to sacrifice their stock, their corn cribs were empty, their shelves were bare of the usual summer stock of canned goods. Yet I found no one there who showed discouragement. There was no one there who was licked. They were already forgetting the drought, as the rains had come, and they were looking forward to the next year and how they should handle their land, and their noses were to the front. They had come forward with all the indomitable courage that is the heritage of the frontier. That, gentlemen, is the real spirit of the West. [Prolonged applause.]

OUR CHANGING CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS BY EDWARD G. SMITH

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. Edward Grandison Smith, president of the board of governors of the West Virginia University, on the subject of Our Changing Constitution. I also ask that certain comments on the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address and comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR CHANGING CONSTITUTION

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES

The price of good popular government is frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

Of these, none rise higher in the American Commonwealth than those expressed provisions embodied in her fundamental law, except that pervading all must be the principle of that fundamental law itself.

What is the Constitution, and what is it like? Why and how does it change? Is it in peril, or is it safe? And why?

For clarity of thinking, there may be much in a definition, a symbol, a phrase, and a name.

DEFINITION

The written Constitution for the United States is their national form of government, devised for the orderly functioning of freedom.

Which is liberty.

Which is the end of government.

A SYMBOL

Our Constitution is revered at home and regarded abroad as the American palladium of liberty.

But the unchanging image of Pallas in the citadel of ancient Troy is an inadequate symbol of our daily changing Constitution.

The electorate should not only abandon that symbol but should come to see familiarly the great Chinese wall-like partition that runs through the Constitution, between its revered part of permanence—built to be formally but not irreverently, materially changed—and its impermanent part of evolutionary or iconoclastic informal change.

A PHRASE AND A NAME

The phrase "form of government" was, by our kinsman, George Mason, used in drafting, and it was adopted by Virginia to describe and to name her first written State constitution.

As the phrase "form of government" chosen by the fathers to describe and name the novel written instrument they made in Virginia in 1776, the first of its kind in the world, is to this day, 158 years later, the accurate phrase to describe and to name that incomparable State invention, so it is also the accurate phrase to describe and to name her national, glorified descendant—that incomparable Federal device for the orderly functioning of freedom, the framers made in Philadelphia in 1787, the written Constitution for the United States.

Constitution is an old word used to denote an old governmental institution that had come down to us without a written form.

It came burdened with historic luggage and definition distinctly different from what the framers intended our national written Constitution to import, different from what in practice it has ever imported and from what it imports now.

The difference has always been and still is responsible for no end of loose and confused thinking on our Constitution.

It should be relieved of its antiquated excess of that luggage and cleared of the inapplicable part of that definition.

To do that here we shall use the Virginia phrase and name "form of government" to designate the written Constitution for the United States.

WHAT IS IT LIKE?

Our Constitution is not like a statute. It is not like a charter, not like Magna Carta, nor the English Constitution, nor is it a religious revelation.

But it declares itself to be, and it is, of the supreme law of the land, and, as poetically expressed by Hooker, "of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world. All things in heaven and earth do her homage—the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power."

In very general and poetical terms of reverence that is what, for us, our Constitution is like.

We may come to more specific, prosaic terms, some of reverence and some of irreverence, in responding to the questions, Why and how does our Constitution change? Is our Constitution in peril, or is it safe? And why?

Let us consider these questions together.

The approach to the response is, The Constitution was made for man and not man for the Constitution.

In order to have a clear response we must proceed farther with the distinction already symbolically suggested and figuratively outlined at the outset—an important distinction, a fundamental distinction, that seems no less than a phase of a principle of the Constitution itself as a whole, setting apart the permanent from the impermanent, the revered from the unrevered.

Without this distinction, one, thinking of our changing Constitution, is likely to be confused. Many have been confused, and needless alarms of serious import have risen out of that confusion.

Much public controversy has ensued and remains, in material part, insistent and unsettled.

In simplest terms, the distinction is this: Our Constitution consists of two parts, the written part, the "form of government", and the unwritten part or content of that form.

They are differently regarded.

In their form of government Americans worship the past.

In their content of their form of government Americans exalt the present.

This is necessary and may happen to each without harm to the other.

But to achieve this end the separation must be clear in the public mind, that is to say:

The form, or, in Bryce's phrase, "the frame" of government giving the form is one thing; the content of that form or frame is quite another. But both form and content of it, in combination, are popularly and technically called the "Constitution."

It makes much more difference what permanently happens to the form, or frame of government giving the form, than what impermanently happens to the mere content of it.

Relatively (paraphrasing Pound), the form of government is stable, but the content of it cannot stand still.

An illustration will help us to see the difference.

HOUSE OF GOVERNMENT

The form, or frame which gives the form, of the house in which you live is one thing; the internal arrangements and fixtures, the more permanent and fixed furniture and furnishings in that house are other things. But it takes both the former and the latter to make the conveniently habitable house.

The form or frame of your house is not the partitions between rooms, nor the paper on the walls, nor the rugs on the floor, nor the table from which you eat, nor the stove that cooks your food, nor the beds on which you sleep, nor the wiring, nor the plumbing, nor the lightning rods, nor the radio antenna and receiving set. These things are the interpretation and expression of the occupants' conception of their somewhat permanent needs in the house at the time, but the form of the house is the interpretation and expression of still more permanent, enduring needs of the succession of occupants over a long period of time, for generations, for centuries.

PROCEDURES OF CHANGE

The form, and the frame giving the form, being the much more permanent and enduring and revered, and the internal arrangements, the fixtures, the plumbing and wiring, the paper on the walls, and the furniture and the furnishings being the much less permanent, less enduring, less revered parts of the house, the procedure of change of each of these two parts is accordingly different from the other, and of different concern and consequence.

So with the two parts of our Constitution.

The Constitution that is exclusively American—the primary part—our written form of government—is changed in material part by formal amendment only.

The secondary part of the Constitution, the content of our form of government, the part more resembling the English Constitution, the implications filling the interstices (Holmes), the unwritten part, is chosen, put in, changed, and expanded by interpretation, and practical application based no more on written law and precedent than on our national progress, condition, and need at the time, however much the written law and precedents from the past and the permanent need of ourselves and the supposed permanent need of our descendants may be argued and considered as beacons illuminating somewhat the untraversed way ahead.

These so-called and somewhat permanent "needs of content" are casual as compared with the still more permanent and enduring needs of the form of government itself.

The growth of the content of the Constitution is sometimes called its "development by interpretation and practical application."

What happens by interpretation and practical application is sometimes "likened to a floating dock, which, while firmly attached to its moorings (the form of government) and not therefore the caprice of the waves, yet rises and falls with the tide of time and circumstance" (Beck).

The executive and legislative departments may initiate content. So, but generally not professedly so, may and does the judiciary, in a pending cause, before a court, by, when warranted, its free decision.

Ordinarily in fact and always in orthodox theory the judiciary does not initiate content, but approves and interprets it or rejects it, that is to say, upon challenge, solemnly determines it.

PRINCIPLES OF CONTENT

First. Technical men, lawyers and judges, and others have avoided the word "unwritten", intimating all that is in the Constitution now was written into it at the beginning, except that in the figure of the poetic Holmes, "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged; it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the times in which it was used."

The figure assumes a word and, when the word is expressed, has its important application as a principle of content.

Second. But generally the word is not there written at all, and as a skin could not be there nor a living thought within it.

In such case the principle of content is the perpetual quasi-constitutional-convention court, with power of adoption, solemnly brings in the unwritten word labeled, in effect, in some such fashion as this: "An implication to fill an interstice between what was written", "general welfare", "common right", "new information", "change", "growth", "emergency", "necessity."

This process of bringing in is one of the processes sometimes technically called "interpretation and practical application."

Third. The next principle of content is "the process of inclusion and exclusion, so often applied in developing a rule, cannot end with its first enunciation. The rule as announced must be deemed tentative. For the many and varying facts to which it will be applied cannot be foreseen. Modification implies growth. It is the life of the law" (Brandeis).

Fourth. The fundamental principle of government as a whole, any government, that determines among other things what is within and what is without the power of government, any government. In our figure, this principle seems to be of the atmospheric content of our house of government.

GOVERNMENT OF MEN

When it is said of our Constitution, "Our Government is one of laws and not of men", only the form of government, the written part of the Constitution, should be meant. When its content is meant, then the maxim is not true, and the fact in procedure is the other way about, and in a sense to an extent, a more accurate expression would seem to be:

Our Government is one of men, having regard, however, for written laws and precedents, and is not a government of laws, solely.

This is the meaning of most of the multitudinous 5 to 4 and 4 to 5 divisions of the 9 justices on decisions of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States that so mystify laymen.

The divisions are not nearly so often on the hallowed written Constitution as on the unhallowed content of it.

Unfortunately the professionals do not say so.

Intrigued by the technical language of their technique, they affect to interpret the written instrument and, at the same time, to fill the interstices with implications.

This unfortunate, contradictory, self-destroying sort of statement is confusing to laymen and often leads the learned astray.

On these divisions one side is popularly called "conservative" and the other "liberal", reflecting the two great schools of thought in government among the thinking people of the country at the time.

The orthodox theory that the divisions are on the form and frame of government itself, as interpreted, makes of the written Constitution a puzzle and a riddle, and makes its interpretation and application unpredictable, and puts it, to that extent, in bad repute, and puts those who administer it in bad repute with those on the losing side.

The losers regard it as something to be juggled with—as something that, in their case, has been juggled with.

With them, reverence for the written Constitution, as immutable without formal amendment, is lost.

This is a great loss.

This contributes to a wide-spread feeling of constitutional insecurity.

This in troublous times might imperil the Government. It has done so. It did so in the 1850's–1860's.

It is in the book that the court may increase their knowledge and change their views and sometimes reverse their decisions on content, but they may never tear a tatter from the written Constitution.

GOVERNMENT OF LAW

We apprehend our government of law, our form of government, is in no peril so long as it is distinguished from the content and the content is chosen, interpreted, and applied in consonance with fundamentals of the changing times but, as the word "content" implies, always well within the hallowed form of our national house of government.

Our form of government, our government of law, is in seven articles comprising much less than 5,000 words which should be familiar to all.

This is "the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

It may be built to by formal amendment, as we have considered and are about to consider further, but should not be changed in any irreverent way.

FORMAL CHANGE

We will now take up the formal amendments and the reason for each of them to show how and why our form of government—our written Constitution—grows and changes and to show the safety that lies in formal amendments, easily enough and quickly enough made to the Federal form of government, the gravity of it considered.

(The original State-convention method functioned wholesale at very distant intervals in Virginia before the War between the States.)

The first 10 amendments contain part of our Federal Bill of Rights, a shrine of fundamental principles of liberty, and are, since adopted, of the very form of government as are all the other formal amendments.

They had already been considered part of the unwritten Constitution. But they were deemed too vital, and, it was considered, they ought to be too enduring to remain of the unwritten part—that is to say, of the content merely—and were, for those reasons, formally incorporated into the written form of the Constitution.

The eleventh amendment protects States from certain suits after the question on a suit against a State had arisen.

The twelfth amendment prescribes the procedure for electing Presidents and Vice Presidents to cure a defect in the original presented in the unhappy contest between Jefferson and Burr for the Presidency.

The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were designed primarily to make freed men constitutionally and actually free.

The sixteenth amendment authorized income taxes as a method of gradual partial redistribution of wealth, without apportionment, after many fortunes had become so perilously large as to be dangerous to liberty.

The seventeenth amendment required Senators to be elected by popular vote instead of by legislatures after it had been considered the balance of power in State legislatures in the presence of great wealth was sometimes indirectly or directly influenced thereby, if not in some cases actually purchased.

The eighteenth amendment prohibited traffic in intoxicating liquor after the liquor traffic had become a national peril.

The nineteenth amendment was a part of a program to make women economically free.

The twentieth amendment brings the Government closer in time to the expressed will of the people.

The twenty-first amendment recognized the eighteenth amendment as a greater national peril than the evil it was aimed at.

These 21 formal amendments in 147 years wrought direct changes in the form of government, the written Constitution itself.

These were changes which were wrought and could have been wrought only by two-thirds of each House of the Congress or two-thirds of the legislatures of the States concurring in submitting each amendment and by three-fourths of the States concurring on ratification.

These are additions and L's and wings to the form of our national house of government.

This form, apart from its content, appears to be in no peril at all. It has produced for our time no highly controversial question remaining unsolved.

The eighteenth amendment was added and not liked and removed—each operation by two-thirds of each House of the Congress on submission and by three-fourths of the States on ratification as stated. This is a comforting assurance of the security of our form of government and of the safety to it that lies in formal amendments.

These 21 amendments were each, as to the validity of their adoption, at least, subject further to challenge and subject, on last resort, to the approval of the Supreme Court.

INFORMAL CHANGE

We now come to the point where confusion of popular thought sets in and popular alarms have sprung up. We come to the so-called "constitutional changes by interpretation and practical application"—changes that are not formally made and are not made in the form or frame of government itself, but informally made in the content of it only.

Here we are not dealing with additions and L's and wings to the form and frame of the national house of government, but with the content of it.

This content, permanent enough, is, nevertheless, as compared with the form and frame, casual and impermanent, and less revered.

It is somewhat as in those private houses that have come down in the same family from Revolutionary days.

In my own family I am thinking of the brick house of the Greens outside of Trenton and of the stone house of the Farises above Bridgeport and of Gunston Hall, along with others, that have changed with succeeding generations, the form preserved and built to and the whole more beautiful and useful and spacious now than ever before, and more revered, and the content of material part new, more modern, better adapted and suited to the time, and more satisfying to the occupants, but the newness inspiring relatively little reverence.

While, at distant intervals, from generation to generation, additions and L's and wings have been added to the form with utmost care for its preservation as something sacred, changes have been almost continuously made in content by the succession of occupants with evolutionary, if not, at times, iconoclastic, irreverence.

To be specific, in illustrative particulars of content, some partitions between rooms have been moved; a front or a back stairway has been put in or taken out; the weather of bare walls has been succeeded first by paint and then by paper; the floor boards, bare, save for an occasional deerskin or bearskin or buffalo robe, have been later covered with home-made carpets and finally with parquetry and oriental patterns, in wool and linen and silk; the big wood fireplace with its great backlog and its forestick on andirons has been succeeded by a coal-burning grate, and that by the natural-gas burner, and that by basement furnace, and that by a central community heating system; the big wood fireplace, cranes, trammels, and hooks, have been succeeded by the kitchen wood or coal stove, and that by the electric plate and electric stove for cooking; the pioneer wall pegs and corner posts and puncheon beds with straw ticks and feather ticks thereon and the ante-bellum four-posters following them have in turn given away to iron bedsteads and mattresses to sleep on; plumbing and electric wiring and lightning rods, telephone and radio for standard waves, and then for short waves also, have been installed.

These are like the changes that have been and are constantly taking place irreverently in the content of our national house of government without formal amendment of the ancient form and without change or harm to the revered frame.

THE PERIL

The trouble is the distinction is neither popularly perceived nor technically expressed by the learned.

There is confusion in popular thought and professional statement.

And casual, evolutionary, or iconoclastic informal change of indifferent content is taken for permanent change of hallowed form.

All because the form and the content of it are together loosely called the "Constitution" and thought of as one thing and not as one thing having two separable parts so entirely different in nature and procedure of change, so utterly unlike in permanence and in degree of high concern and consequences.

In using the word "peril" we mean no more than to point an error and a road away, but an error that seems serious in shocking deep loyalties and making controversy of unascertainable possibilities and a road away that is clearer and safer than the others.

NINE WISE MEN

The British have, in the American sense, no written "form of government." As to content, the American Constitution differs less widely from the British.

It must have been to emphasize these differences that John Marshall said, "The Government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws and not of men." His meaning, upon the theory already stated, must have been: Our form or frame of government giving the form, rather than the content, is one of laws and not of men.

Had he been speaking of its content alone, in a sense and to an extent, a more accurate expression would have been: Our Government is one of men, having regard for written laws and precedents, and is not one of laws only.

And as to content, on last resort, ours is a government by our nine wise men of the Supreme Court of the United States, a sort of "continuous constitutional convention" (BECK), with power of ratification—within their jurisdiction, "the living voice of the people" (Bryce).

This is a body as far removed from the hysteria of the time as any governing body, in any part of the world, in any age, and yet it is constantly replenished in personnel, and form, therefore, in the best sense, is always of the people themselves.

This replenishment is by nomination by the President, himself every 4 years, fresh from the people, raised to the highest executive eminence.

The President's nominations, to become effective, must be confirmed by the Senate, one-third of the Members of which every 2 years are also fresh from the people, raised to the highest legislative eminence.

But, even so, the mere content of the written Constitution, approved by that Court, is not "the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

EXAMPLES

Some examples of the change of content of the form of the Federal Government, called the "Constitution", made by interpretation and practical application, are the growth of the content of—

The general-welfare clause; the admiralty jurisdiction; the money clause; and the commerce clause.

Let us now illustrate this growth of content by two or three examples:

GENERAL WELFARE

There was in our written form of government no expressed provision for acquiring geographical territory, and neither of the general-welfare clauses nor any other was originally supposed to authorize the acquisition of additional territory, but, nevertheless, for the general welfare of the United States they have multiplied the territorial content of their written Federal Constitution more than four times.

The United States have added to the 13 original States and the Territories of the General Government at its foundation:

The Louisiana Purchase, the Oregon Acquisition, the Florida Purchase, the Texan Annexation, the Mexican Cession, the Gadsden Purchase, Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, Guam Island, Wake Island, the Panama Canal Zone, American Samoan Islands, and the Virgin Islands.

And now the sun does not set upon her Stars and Stripes.

There was no formal amendment to the form of government for the purpose of authorizing these acquisitions and annexations, but these tremendous additions to the territorial content of the Federal form of government were made from time to time by interpretation and practical application.

While the geographic and historical content of our "form of government" and the constitutional power to choose that content thus tremendously increased, the "form of government" itself, the written Constitution, was not changed, only the content of it.

FOURTH PRINCIPLE OF CONTENT RESTATED

If, as some say with show of logic, that, underlying the treaty power, the general-welfare clauses are not so extensive as to have really authorized these territorial acquisitions, then must there not be a fundamental principle of the Constitution itself as a whole to have done so, the tenth amendment, applicable to particulars, notwithstanding?

May not this principle be considered as determining, not only in one of its aspects, what is within the power of government, any government, as for example, the acquisition of geographic territory; but also, in another of its aspects, what is without the power of government, any government, as for example, things of "common right", in the Boston Beer Co., the Topeka, and the Butchers' Union cases; and in another of its aspects, whether there is a public element in private right, and, when found present, the measure of it, as for example, the eminent domain of the person and of property; and in still another of its aspects, what is the theory, not expressed in but, "essentially attached to a written constitution", any written constitution, as, for example, that legislative acts repugnant to it are void and that to adjudicate accordingly "is of the very essence of judicial duty", in Marbury v. Madison, and in our figure of the house of government and its content—is not this principle the very atmosphere in the place?

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION

Federal jurisdiction in admiralty as originally interpreted has been even more tremendously expanded by interpretation and practical application.

The jurisdiction of the United States in admiralty over navigable waters and the interstate and foreign commerce thereof was till 1851 limited in this country, as the admiralty jurisdiction had been in England, to waters, not inland, and where the tide ebbs and flows. But our lakes were inland seas, and our rivers were hundreds and, some of them, thousands of miles in length, capable of supporting commerce where the tide did not ebb and flow. They were navigable in fact, but for two generations were not navigable in law. Thereafter they were held to be navigable in law, contrary to English precedent and two generations of American precedent, thereby changing the content of the Constitution to extend in its admiralty jurisdiction from the limits of the ebb and flow of the tide to all our waters capable of floating logs in interstate and foreign commerce. This was done by interpretation and practical application by the Congress and the courts.

The figure, quoted from Holmes, on page 15, explains poetically and clearly this change of content of the Federal admiralty jurisdiction.

THE MONEY CLAUSE

This may be passed as too controversial just now for the present purpose. But the arguments pro and con on content of it are interesting and illuminating learning on the consequences of the dual nature of the Constitution and on an aspect of what we have suggested above as a principle of the Constitution.

COMMERCE CLAUSE

The remarkable expansion of the content of the commerce clause by interpretation and practical application to deal with public questions, such as lotteries and other forms of gambling, certain labor questions, certain phases of the liquor traffic, certain problems of monopoly and price regulation, and certain public-health and public-morals problems need only be mentioned to bring to mind a flood of controversial questions on the Constitution resulting in expansion of content. These expansions were made by interpretation and practical application by statutes and by the courts.

CHOICES

These changes, and all others in the content of the Constitution, must be on challenge approved by the judiciary and on last resort by the Federal Supreme Court, or they fail.

By this orthodox procedure the Supreme Court chooses governmental policy through choice of items of the unwritten Constitution by which it grows and changes with discovery and invention.

In this field of content in its judgments on near political, on social, and economic questions properly before it the Supreme Court gives the national command of execution, "stand fast", or "retreat", or "advance."

As were the Virginians at Williamsburg in 1776 respecting the whole form of government for Virginia, as was the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia in 1787 respecting the entire original form of government for the United States, as were thereafter the Congress and the States as to the several formal amendments to the Federal form of government, so, as to items of content of the form of government for the United States is the Supreme Court, from time to time in pending causes before it involving those items, confronted with choice of governmental values, and in choosing are responding to the question, but lately formulated by Mr. Justice Cardozo, "What values shall we choose—those of today or of tomorrow or of a future that is close at hand, or of the unplumbed future, trackless as the sea?"

If by the Virginians at Williamsburg in 1776, if by the convention at Philadelphia in 1787, and if by the several formal amendments to the form by the Congress and the States in concert thereafter, and if by the innumerable several informal amendments of content by the Supreme Court the choices have run the gamut of all these, not only once, but again and again, according to the arguments at the times, who is there to say now, after experience of them, but that, on the whole, the choices have been wondrous wise and have justified the public confidence?

And a merit of our constitutional content is that, on account of its informal choice, its nature, and its newness, it has not inspired Trojan-like reverence for the image of Pallas in the citadel of ancient Troy, nor British-like reverence for Magna Carta of Runnymede, nor American-like reverence for her form of government of 1787, and the formal amendments thereto, and it is in consequence susceptible of needed change without delay and without shock when familiarly seen to be separate from the revered Federal form of government itself.

IN CONCLUSION

So it is that our Constitution preserves all its glorious form of government which more than one-third of either House of the Congress by one course of procedure, or more than one-third of State legislatures by the other on submission, or more than one-fourth of the States on ratification, by negation, declares is worth while, and preserves all the exalted constitutional content of that form which, on dernier resort, as many as 5 of our 9 wise men sitting as the Supreme Court of the United States, by their negation, declare is worth while.

And in American theory and practice that is enough.

So it is that America has had for 158 years not only the marvel of the first Federal Constitution of its kind to be written and the marvel of its being so written and of its being so interpreted and amended as to form, formally, and as to content, informally, that it has been rigid enough and safe enough and elastic enough that it is not static, that it is not a dead-hand, that it is not a vice, is not a statutory law, is not a charter, not a Magna Carta, is not a religious revelation, but is a Constitution that is a living governmental organism, changing and growing, as by nature, to the needs of the Nation and with the needs of the Nation.

This, as we have seen, is achieved as to the "form of government" by formal amendments supported by constitutional majorities—first by two-thirds of each House of the Congress or two-thirds of State legislatures concurring on submission and then by three-fourths of the States concurring, on ratification, and, upon challenge, the Supreme Court approving.

These seem to be a series of mechanically perfect devices to change the form of government by formal amendment as needed and to protect it from irreverent change.

This, as we have seen, is achieved as to content of the form of government by interpretation and practical application, approved, on challenge, in dernier resort, by a majority of America's nine wise men, of the people sitting as the Supreme Court of the United States, safe in office, for life or good behavior, from every political gust and peril and wise in the wisdom of government.

All these, made well known and generally understood, should be the safe guaranties of the integrity of our entire Constitution against every ill wind that blows, whether looked for or sudden, whether periodically or constantly, whether in moderation or in storm.

Through the free operation of these devices our written Constitution has changed and should continue to change formally with the growth of our civilization in the atmosphere of reverence for it.

Thus our unwritten Constitution has marched and should continue to march with the progress of the times in the irreverent atmosphere of evolutionary informality for it.

Thus America's form of government, the written Constitution, has been and should continue to be not only responsive enough and rigid enough but also stable and enduring enough for a free and reasonably reverent people.

Thus the content of America's form of government, the unwritten Constitution, has ever been and should continue to be not only rigid enough and responsive enough, but also stable and enduring enough for liberty in evolutionary and even in moderately iconoclastic ages.

It remains for the prescribed constitutional proportions of the electorate to preserve and to exercise with intelligent vigilance their unfagging will to maintain constitutional government and to continue constitutionally free.

[Editorial, Charleston Gazette, Oct. 21, 1934]

A GREAT SPEECH

"A word spoken in due season, how good is it"; and "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold and pictures of silver."

Thus King Solomon expressed what we hope is our aspiration at this moment.

Why give you these thoughts of the great son of David at this time? Because a citizen of Harrison County, who walks, works, and writes in the atmosphere of the county that has produced historic characters, headed by Stonewall Jackson, has spoken a word in "due season"—"a word fitly spoken"—which appears elsewhere in this issue.

We refer to the address of Hon. E. G. Smith, of Clarksburg, one of the governors of the State university, and a brilliant, profound, modest—too modest—lawyer, and statesman.

The occasion was Constitution Day, and the patriotic societies of Harrison and adjoining counties cooperated with the Rotary Club in giving strength to the magnet and attracted the heart interest which required expression.

It was easy to get speakers for such an occasion, when adjectives are usually tossed about for thought, and figures of speech might have been for that "word fitly spoken."

Patrick Henry's "liberty or death" speech was, in large measure, a response to the American heart, "a word in due season." Bryan's "crown of thorns and cross of gold" speech was largely inspired by an occasion and an audience hungry and athirst for the heart word "fitly spoken."

The Gazette delights in knowing that there are such men in West Virginia as E. G. Smith.

We have pride in his address, made at the opportune time, that will stand alongside the speeches of Attorney General Cummings and the other broad-minded constructive students of the Constitution who can see, eye to eye, with John Marshall when in Congress, that "powers necessary for the attainment of all objects which are general in their nature, which interest all America would be naturally vested in the government of the whole."

In Little Dorritt, Dickens thus described in England what intrenched privilege is trying to do now in the United States—"Whatever was required to be done, the circumlocution office was beforehand with all the public departments in the art of perceiving how not to do it."

"What was required to be done" confronted President Hoover, who could not defy the "circumlocution office."

The "required", with the superimposed difficulties of delay, confronted Roosevelt. The latter with a cooperating Congress acted as he had promised and as the people expected. The "circumlocution office" in the United States is organized political disappointment, exposed manipulators of shady business. Oh, yes; and their lawyers, agents, and affiliates. These latter seek to stir up a dust storm in the sacred name of liberty, under the pretense of preserving the Constitution.

Read Mr. Smith's address and observe the hollowness of this pretense.

"Noticed * * * your speech on Our Changing Constitution and compliment and congratulate you on it; and may say our State university is indeed fortunate that you are president of the board of governors."—Hon. Tracy L. Jeffords, of Harpers Ferry, Charles Town, and Washington.

---

"* * * A great address, betraying a profound study of the 'form of government' set up by our Constitution and of what he terms the unwritten part or 'content' of that 'form.'"—Hon. Samuel M. Shortridge, former United States Senator from California.

DEATH OF THE LATE SPEAKER RAINEY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution (H. Res. 23) of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House has learned with profound sensibility and sorrow of the death of HENRY T. RAINEY, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-third Congress.

Resolved, That in the death of the Honorable HENRY T. RAINEY the United States has sustained an irreparable loss.

Resolved, That this House, of which he was a distinguished Member and leader, unite in honoring his sterling character, the ability, probity, and patriotic motives which illustrated his public career, and the grace and dignity which marked his intercourse with his fellow citizens.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I take the liberty to move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives which has just been laid before this body expressing its regret over the loss of the former Speaker of the House. We who in the years past have dealt with him in an official capacity knew of his competency and his worth.

I shall occupy the time of the Senate a moment merely to call to their attention the expression from the State of Illinois. My honorable colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] and myself long knew the distinguished Member of the House, the late Speaker. Our personal association as well as our political affiliations qualify us to speak to this honorable body of his high character, of the esteem in which the people of Illinois held him, the statesmanship he represented, but above all else his sincere devotion to the needs of the masses and his advocacy of the rights of humanity.

I delight, sir, to lend my voice in expressions of praise, and submit to this honorable body that there be none who more deserves to be and none who will be more remembered with reverent admiration in the State of Illinois than the late distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, HENRY T. RAINEY.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleague in his expressions of commendation on the life and character of HENRY T. RAINEY. It was my privilege to know him, perhaps, longer than any other Member of the Congress. He was my Member of Congress for many years, as I lived in his congressional district. I know of no character in public life whose acts were more consistent, who performed a greater public service, and who to a greater extent held always in view the welfare of the people, not only of his State and his district but of the Nation, than HENRY T. RAINEY. I wish to join my colleague in his expressions concerning the late Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I now offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 10) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, late Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT LANDIS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution (H. Res. 22) of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. FREDERICK LANDIS, a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution on the death of the Honorable FREDERICK LANDIS, one of the most colorful political figures in the State of Indiana and in the Nation, and ask that it be read and considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 11) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. FREDERICK LANDIS, late a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

RECESS

Mr. VAN NUYS. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Speaker of the House and to the memory of the late Representative-elect from Indiana, and pursuant to the order heretofore made, I move that the Senate now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously entered, until Monday, January 7, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1935

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 3, 1935)

The recess having expired, the House (at 12 o'clock noon) was called to order by the Speaker.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE RESOURCES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the Select Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources made pursuant to House Resolution 237 of the Seventy-third Congress, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

INVESTIGATION OF PETROLEUM SITUATION THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce appointed to investigate the petroleum situation throughout the United States pursuant to House Resolution 441 of the Seventy-third Congress, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

FINAL REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2 OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the final report of Subcommittee No. 2 of the Committee on Military Affairs, made pursuant to House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3 OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the final report of Subcommittee No. 3 of the Committee on Military Affairs, made pursuant to House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

MAJORITY LEADER

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been requested to lay before the House the following communication from the majority leader, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

I hereby appoint Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR to act temporarily as majority leader during my absence from the House on account of illness.

This the 4th day of January 1935.

WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
Majority Leader.

[Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from the majority leader which reads as follows:

I hereby appoint PATRICK J. BOLAND, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, as Democratic whip for the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

This the 4th day of January 1935.

W. B. BANKHEAD,
Majority Leader.

RECESS

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now stand in recess subject to the call of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Accordingly, at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess, to meet at the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House (at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

JOINT MEETING OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE

At 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper, Mr. J. J. Sinnott, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On behalf of the House the Chair appoints the following committee to conduct the President into the Chamber: Messrs. TAYLOR of Colorado, DOUGHTON, and SNELL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints as a like committee Senators ROBINSON, PITTMAN, and MCNARY.

At 12 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper, Mr. J. J. Sinnott, announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Chamber and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m., the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House and stood at the Clerk's desk, amid prolonged applause.

The SPEAKER. Senators and Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I have the distinguished honor and privilege of presenting to you the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, the Constitution wisely provides that the Chief Executive shall report to the Congress on the state of the Union, for through you, the chosen legislative representatives, our citizens everywhere may fairly judge the progress of our governing. I am confident that today, in the light of the events of the past 2 years, you do not consider it merely a trite phrase when I tell you that I am truly glad to greet you and that I look forward to common counsel, to useful cooperation, and to genuine friendships between us.

We have undertaken a new order of things, yet we progress to it under the framework and in the spirit and intent of the American Constitution. We have proceeded throughout the Nation a measurable distance on the road toward this new order. Materially, I can report to you substantial benefits to our agricultural population, increased industrial activity, and profits to our merchants. Of equal moment, there is evident a restoration of that spirit of confidence and faith which marks the American character. Let him who, for speculative profit or partisan purpose, without just warrant would seek to disturb or dispel this assurance, take heed before he assumes responsibility for any act which slows our onward steps.

Throughout the world change is the order of the day. In every nation economic problems, long in the making, have brought crises of many kinds for which the masters of old practice and theory were unprepared. In most nations social justice, no longer a distant ideal, has become a definite goal, and ancient governments are beginning to heed the call.

Thus, the American people do not stand alone in the world in their desire for change. We seek it through tested liberal traditions, through processes which retain all of the deep essentials of that republican form of representative government first given to a troubled world by the United States.

As the various parts in the program begun in the extraordinary session of the Seventy-third Congress shape themselves in practical administration, the unity of our program reveals itself to the Nation. The outlines of the new economic order, rising from the disintegration of the old, are apparent. We test what we have done as our measures take root in the living texture of life. We see where we have built wisely and where we can do still better.

The attempt to make a distinction between recovery and reform is a narrowly conceived effort to substitute the appearance of reality for reality itself. When a man is convalescing from illness, wisdom dictates not only cure of the symptoms but also removal of their cause.

It is important to recognize that while we seek to outlaw specific abuses, the American objective of today has an infinitely deeper, finer, and more lasting purpose than mere repression. Thinking people in almost every country of the world have come to realize certain fundamental difficulties with which civilization must reckon. Rapid changes—the machine age, the advent of universal and rapid communication, and many other new factors—have brought new problems. Succeeding generations have attempted to keep pace by reforming in piecemeal fashion this or that attendant abuse. As a result evils overlap and reform becomes confused and frustrated. We lose sight, from time to time, of our ultimate human objectives.

Let us for a moment strip from our simple purpose the confusion that results from a multiplicity of detail and from millions of written and spoken words.

We find our population suffering from old inequalities, little changed by past sporadic remedies. In spite of our efforts and in spite of our talk we have not weeded out the overprivileged and we have not effectively lifted up the underprivileged. Both of these manifestations of injustice have retarded happiness. No wise man has any intention of destroying what is known as the "profit motive", because by the profit motive we mean the right by work to earn a decent livelihood for ourselves and for our families.

We have, however, a clear mandate from the people, that Americans must forswear that conception of the acquisition of wealth which, through excessive profits, creates undue private power over private affairs and, to our misfortune, over public affairs as well. In building toward this end we do not destroy ambition, nor do we seek to divide our wealth into equal shares on stated occasions. We continue to recognize the greater ability of some to earn more than others. But we do assert that the ambition of the individual to obtain for him and his a proper security, a reasonable leisure, and a decent living throughout life is an ambition to be preferred to the appetite for great wealth and great power.

I recall to your attention my message to the Congress last June in which I said, "Among our objectives I place the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation first." That remains our first and continuing task; and in a very real sense every major legislative enactment of this Congress should be a component part of it.

In defining immediate factors which enter into our quest, I have spoken to the Congress and the people of three great divisions:

First. The security of a livelihood through the better use of the national resources of the land in which we live.

Second. The security against the major hazards and vicissitudes of life.

Third. The security of decent homes.

I am now ready to submit to the Congress a broad program designed ultimately to establish all three of these factors of security—a program which because of many lost years will take many future years to fulfill.

A study of our national resources, more comprehensive than any previously made, shows the vast amount of necessary and practicable work which needs to be done for the development and preservation of our natural wealth for the enjoyment and advantage of our people in generations to come. The sound use of land and water is far more comprehensive than the mere planting of trees, building of dams, distributing of electricity, or retirement of submarginal land. It recognizes that stranded populations, either in the country or the city, cannot have security under the conditions that now surround them.

To this end we are ready to begin to meet this problem—the intelligent care of population throughout our Nation, in accordance with an intelligent distribution of the means of livelihood for that population. A definite program for putting people to work, of which I shall speak in a moment, is a component part of this greater program of security of livelihood through the better use of our national resources.

Closely related to the broad problem of livelihood is that of security against the major hazards of life. Here also a comprehensive survey of what has been attempted or accomplished in many nations and in many States proves to me that the time has come for action by the National Government. I shall send to you in a few days definite recommendations based on these studies. These recommendations will cover the broad subjects of unemployment insurance and old-age insurance, of benefits for children, for mothers, for the handicapped, for maternity care, and for other aspects of dependency and illness where a beginning can now be made.

The third factor—better homes for our people—has also been the subject of experimentation and study. Here, too, the first practical steps can be made through the proposals which I shall suggest in relation to giving work to the unemployed.

Whatever we plan and whatever we do should be in the light of these three clear objectives of security. We cannot afford to lose valuable time in haphazard public policies which cannot find a place in the broad outlines of these major purposes. In that spirit I come to an immediate issue made for us by hard and inescapable circumstance—the task of putting people to work. In the spring of 1933 the issue of destitution seemed to stand apart; today, in the light of our experience and our new national policy, we find we can put people to work in ways which conform to, initiate, and carry forward the broad principles of that policy.

The first objectives of emergency legislation of 1933 were to relieve destitution, to make it possible for industry to operate in a more rational and orderly fashion, and to put behind industrial recovery the impulse of large expenditures in Government undertakings. The purpose of the National Industrial Recovery Act to provide work for more people succeeded in a substantial manner within the first few months of its life, and the act has continued to maintain employment gains and greatly improved working conditions in industry.

The program of public works provided for in the Recovery Act launched the Federal Government into a task for which there was little time to make preparation and little American experience to follow. Great employment has been given and is being given by these works.

More than two billions of dollars have also been expended in direct relief to the destitute. Local agencies, of necessity, determined the recipients of this form of relief. With inevitable exceptions, the funds were spent by them with reasonable efficiency, and as a result actual want of food and clothing in the great majority of cases has been overcome.

But the stark fact before us is that great numbers still remain unemployed.

A large proportion of these unemployed and their dependents have been forced on the relief rolls. The burden on the Federal Government has grown with great rapidity. We have here a human as well as an economic problem. When humane considerations are concerned, Americans give them precedence. The lessons of history, confirmed by the evidence immediately before me, show conclusively that continued dependence upon relief induces a spiritual and moral disintegration fundamentally destructive to the national fiber. To dole out relief in this way is to administer a narcotic, a subtle destroyer of the human spirit. It is inimical to the dictates of sound policy. It is in violation of the traditions of America. Work must be found for able-bodied but destitute workers.

The Federal Government must and shall quit this business of relief.

I am not willing that the vitality of our people be further sapped by the giving of cash, of market baskets, of a few hours of weekly work cutting grass, raking leaves, or picking up papers in the public parks. We must preserve not only the bodies of the unemployed from destitution but also their self-respect, their self-reliance, and courage and determination. This decision brings me to the problem of what the Government should do with approximately 5,000,000 unemployed now on the relief rolls.

About one million and a half of these belong to the group which in the past was dependent upon local welfare efforts. Most of them are unable for one reason or another to maintain themselves independently—for the most part, through no fault of their own. Such people, in the days before the great depression, were cared for by local effort—by States, by counties, by towns, by cities, by churches, and by private welfare agencies. It is my thought that in the future they must be cared for as they were before. I stand ready, through my own personal efforts and through the public influence of the office that I hold, to help these local agencies to get the means necessary to assume this burden.

The security legislation which I shall propose to the Congress will, I am confident, be of assistance to local effort in the care of this type of cases. Local responsibility can and will be resumed, for, after all, common sense tells us that the wealth necessary for this task existed and still exists in the local community, and the dictates of sound administration require that this responsibility be in the first instance a local one.

There are, however, an additional three and one-half million employable people who are on relief. With them the problem is different and the responsibility is different. This group was the victim of a Nation-wide depression caused by conditions which were not local but national. The Federal Government is the only governmental agency with sufficient power and credit to meet this situation. We have assumed this task, and we shall not shrink from it in the future. It is a duty dictated by every intelligent consideration of national policy to ask you to make it possible for the United States to give employment to all of these three and one-half million employable people now on relief, pending their absorption in a rising tide of private employment.

It is my thought that, with the exception of certain of the normal public building operations of the Government, all emergency public works shall be united in a single new and greatly enlarged plan.

With the establishment of this new system we can supersede the Federal Emergency Relief Administration with a coordinated authority which will be charged with the orderly liquidation of our present relief activities and the substitution of a national chart for the giving of work.

This new program of emergency public employment should be governed by a number of practical principles.

(1) All work undertaken should be useful—not just for a day or a year, but useful in the sense that it affords permanent improvement in living conditions or that it creates future new wealth for the Nation.

(2) Compensation on emergency public projects should be in the form of security payments which should be larger than the amount now received as a relief dole but, at the same time, not so large as to encourage the rejection of opportunities for private employment or the leaving of private employment to engage in Government work.

(3) Projects should be undertaken on which a large percentage of direct labor can be used.

(4) Preference should be given to those projects which will be self-liquidating in the sense that there is a reasonable expectation that the Government will get its money back at some future time.

(5) The projects undertaken should be selected and planned so as to compete as little as possible with private enterprises. This suggests that if it were not for the necessity of giving useful work to the unemployed now on relief these projects in most instances would not now be undertaken.

(6) The planning of projects would seek to assure work during the coming fiscal year to the individuals now on relief, or until such time as private employment is available In order to make adjustment to increasing private employment, work should be planned with a view to tapering it off in proportion to the speed with which the emergency workers are offered positions with private employers.

(7) Efforts should be made to locate projects where they will serve the greatest unemployment needs as shown by present relief rolls, and the broad program of the National Resources Board should be freely used for guidance in selection. Our ultimate objective being the enrichment of human lives, the Government has the primary duty to use its emergency expenditures as much as possible to serve those who cannot secure the advantages of private capital.

Ever since the adjournment of the Seventy-third Congress the administration has been studying from every angle the possibility and the practicability of new forms of employment. As a result of these studies I have arrived at certain very definite convictions as to the amount of money that will be necessary for the sort of public projects that I have described. I shall submit these figures in my Budget message. I assure you now they will be within the sound credit of the Government.

The work itself will cover a wide field, including clearance of slums, which for adequate reasons cannot be undertaken by private capital; in rural housing of several kinds, where, again, private capital is unable to function; in rural electrification; in the reforestation of the great watersheds of the Nation; in an intensified program to prevent soil erosion and to reclaim blighted areas; in improving existing road systems and in constructing national highways designed to handle modern traffic; in the elimination of grade crossings; in the extension and enlargement of the successful work of the Civilian Conservation Corps; in non-Federal work, mostly self-liquidating and highly useful to local divisions of government; and on many other projects which the Nation needs and cannot afford to neglect.

This is the method which I propose to you in order that we may better meet this present-day problem of unemployment. Its greatest advantage is that it fits logically and usefully into the long-range permanent policy of providing the three types of security which constitute as a whole an American plan for the betterment of the future of the American people.

I shall consult with you from time to time concerning other measures of national importance. Among the subjects that lie immediately before us are the consolidation of Federal regulatory administration over all forms of transportation, the renewal and clarification of the general purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the strengthening of our facilities for the prevention, detection, and treatment of crime and criminals, the restoration of sound conditions in the public-utilities field through abolition of the evil features of holding companies, the gradual tapering off of the emergency credit activities of Government, and improvement in our taxation forms and methods.

We have already begun to feel the bracing effect upon our economic system of a restored agriculture. The hundreds of millions of additional income that farmers are receiving is finding its way into the channels of trade. The farmers' share of the national income is slowly rising. The economic facts justify the wide-spread opinion of those engaged in agriculture that our provision for maintaining a balanced production gives at this time the most adequate remedy for an old and vexing problem. For the present and especially in view of abnormal world conditions, agricultural adjustment with certain necessary improvements in methods should continue.

It seems appropriate to call attention at this time to the fine spirit shown during the past year by our public servants. I cannot praise too highly the cheerful work of the civil-service employees, and of those temporarily working for the Government. As for those thousands in our various public agencies spread throughout the country who, without compensation, agreed to take over heavy responsibilities in connection with our various loan agencies and particularly in direct relief work, I cannot say too much. I do not think any country could show a higher average of cheerful and even enthusiastic teamwork than has been shown by these men and women.

I cannot with candor tell you that general international relationships outside the borders of the United States are improved. On the surface of things many old jealousies are resurrected, old passions aroused; new strivings for armament and power, in more than one land, rear their ugly heads. I hope that calm counsel and constructive leadership will provide the steadying influence and the time necessary for the coming of new and more practical forms of representative government throughout the world wherein privilege and power will occupy a lesser place and world welfare a greater.

I believe, however, that our own peaceful and neighborly attitude toward other nations is coming to be understood and appreciated. The maintenance of international peace is a matter in which we are deeply and unselfishly concerned. Evidence of our persistent and undeniable desire to prevent armed conflict has recently been more than once afforded.

There is no ground for apprehension that our relations with any nation will be otherwise than peaceful. Nor is there ground for doubt that the people of most nations seek relief from the threat and burden attaching to the false theory that extravagant armament cannot be reduced and limited by international accord.

The ledger of the past year shows many more gains than losses. Let us not forget that, in addition to saving millions from utter destitution, child labor has been for the moment outlawed, thousands of homes saved to their owners, and, most important of all, the morale of the Nation has been restored. Viewing the year 1934 as a whole, you and I can agree that we have a generous measure of reasons for giving thanks.

It is not empty optimism that moves me to a strong hope in the coming year. We can, if we will, make 1935 a genuine period of good feeling, sustained by a sense of purposeful progress. Beyond the material recovery, I sense a spiritual recovery as well. The people of America are turning as never before to those permanent values that are not limited to the physical objectives of life. There are growing signs of this on every hand. In the face of these spiritual impulses we are sensible of the divine Providence to which nations turn now, as always, for guidance and fostering care.

Thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the President retired from the Hall of the House.

At 1 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m., the Speaker announced that the joint session was dissolved.

Thereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 28

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Appropriations, to wit:

James P. Buchanan, of Texas, chairman; Edward T. Taylor, of Colorado; William B. Oliver, of Alabama; Anthony J. Griffin, of New York; John N. Sandlin, of Louisiana; Clarence Cannon, of Missouri; Clifton A. Woodrum, of Virginia; William W. Arnold, of Illinois; John J. Boylan, of New York; Tilman B. Parks, of Arkansas; Louis Ludlow, of Indiana; William J. Granfield, of Massachusetts; Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas; Thomas S. McMillan, of South Carolina; Glover H. Cary, of Kentucky; B. M. Jacobsen, of Iowa; Malcolm C. Tarver, of Georgia; Jed Johnson, of Oklahoma; J. Buell Snyder, of Pennsylvania; William B. Umstead, of North Carolina; William R. Thom, of Ohio; Marion A. Zioncheck, of Washington; John F. Dockweiler, of California; Edward C. Moran, Jr., of Maine; James McAndrews, of Illinois; and Emmet O'Neal, of Kentucky.

The resolution was agreed to.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 29

Resolved, That the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Hospitalization appointed by the Speaker to conduct certain investigations under authority of H. R. 409 of the Seventy-third Congress, is hereby granted additional time until January 18, 1935, to prepare and file its report and recommendations for legislation with the House. Any unexpended balance of the total amount authorized for the use of said special committee under House Resolution 413 of the Seventy-third Congress is hereby continued available until said date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it, this merely permits the committee to complete its work by filing a report.

Mr. RANKIN. It gives the committee 2 more weeks.

Mr. BLANTON. And no further money will be expended?

Mr. RANKIN. Except what has already been appropriated.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be no request for additional funds?

Mr. RANKIN. No; no request for additional funds; sufficient funds have already been provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AT THE CONVENING OF CONGRESS

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of possible interest to the people of the Fourth Congressional District of California, as well as to people in other districts where similar tactics may have been used, I wish to insert in the RECORD a routine letter which I and probably all Members of the previous Congress received from the chief bill clerk of the House of Representatives, dated December 4, 1934, reading as follows:

MY DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN: In checking over the records of the Seventy-third Congress, I noticed that you introduced most of your bills, especially private bills, at one time. I am wondering if you would be so kind as to do the same again, sending them now, as this will greatly facilitate the handling of these bills, not only in this office but in the Government Printing Office. Thanking you for any consideration you may give this letter, I remain,

Very truly yours,

WM. J. MCDERMOTT, Jr.,
Chief Bill Clerk.

Prior to the convening of the Seventy-third Congress I received a communication from Mr. South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives, reading as follows:

Subject: Introduction of bills.

* * * It is suggested, in the interest of expedition and accuracy, that the Members or their clerks prepare in advance of the meeting of Congress all bills and joint resolutions which are to be introduced during the first days of the session and file them with the Clerk of the House for preparation for printing. Such bills and joint resolutions will be the originals, and it will be unnecessary to make duplicates for deposit in the House or to reintroduce a bill at a subsequent session of Congress. Thus it will be possible promptly to group the bills in alphabetical order of Members' names for convenient reference in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to number the bills of each Member in sequence. The reference of bills granting pensions should be indicated by the introducer, whether to the Committee on Pensions (other than Civil War claims) or to the Committee on Invalid Pensions (Civil War claims only). Bills providing for preliminary surveys of rivers and harbors are classified as private bills.

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk United States House of Representatives.

In accordance with these suggestions, it has been my custom to file with the bill clerk of the House of Representatives in advance of the convening of Congress the bills which I have ready for introduction, which bills, however, cannot be recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until the first RECORD of the session is issued containing the proceedings of the opening day of the session.

Prior to the convening of this Congress, I filed with the bill clerk of the House 64 bills, which probably will be recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the opening day of the session, or within the next few following days.

During the last campaign, one of my opponents accused me of deliberately blocking legislation on the opening day of the Seventy-third Congress by introducing a number of bills on that day. Whether or not he understood that these bills were submitted and printed, at the specific request of the Clerk of the House, several days prior to the convening of Congress, I do not know, but I am taking this opportunity to explain that, under the routine procedure and in order to facilitate the handling and printing of such bills, Members of Congress are urged to transmit such bills as he or she may have before the actual date of the convening of Congress.

TAKING THE PROFITS OUT OF WAR

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of taking the profits out of war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, on the first Monday in December 1922 I introduced House Joint Resolution 300, being a joint resolution "To promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minify the profits of war." A copy of that joint resolution is hereinafter reproduced.

Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minify the profits of war

Whereas it is the duty of Congress to require that the burdens and benefits of war shall be justly and fairly distributed; and

Whereas it is the duty of all citizens to contribute to our Nation's success in war according to their several capacities and resources; and

Whereas modern warfare rests increasingly upon scientific knowledge and industrial resources and must be carried on by the Nation as a whole and not merely by the young men in arms; and

Whereas to take the profits out of war and to require equal service for all, and deny special profits to any, will be conducive to peace (which is our traditional policy); and

Whereas we should employ the experience of recent wars to work out and enact into law, while we are yet at peace, such provisions and policies to be pursued when the war shall come as shall empower the President immediately to mobilize all the resources of the country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created to draft and report to the President of the United States, who in turn shall transmit the same, with or without his approval, to Congress not later than the first Monday in December 1924, proposed legislation to accomplish in fact the principles and policies expressed in this resolution.

That said commission shall be bipartisan and nonpolitical and shall be composed of 4 members of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives and 2 members of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce, and 3 other persons not holding official or governmental position whatever, and selected with a view to represent in a general sense the views of labor, industry, and capital, respectively.

Within 30 days after the approval of this resolution the President shall appoint and announce the members of said commission and shall direct the same to meet in the city of Washington, D. C., as soon thereafter as may be practicable, and shall supply from the War Department all necessary office and clerical assistance.

When said commission shall meet, it shall organize by electing one of its number as chairman and another as vice chairman, and shall appoint a secretary and proceed to draft proposed legislation to accomplish the aims and purposes of this resolution; and such proposed legislation, with any comment upon same deemed desirable, shall be transmitted to the President not later than November 1, 1924, and the President shall direct that there shall be printed not exceeding 5,000 copies thereof for the use of Congress.

That the guiding principle to control the labors of said commission is that true preparedness demands our calm and careful adoption in advance of another war of a Nation-wide policy of service for all citizens, to the end that while young men are laying down for their country the comforts and joys of home and family, their health, their strength and time, their blood, bodies, and life itself, others not required to make these greater sacrifices may be required to lay down equitably and fairly some of their material resources and wealth, to the great end that victory for the Nation's ideals may speedily come, and that after victory there be no need for any adjustment of compensation and no mighty war debt piled up to sap the strength of the producing activities of the people for scores of years.

That no compensation shall be paid any member of said commission, and no expenses shall be incurred by them except the actual cost of maintenance and travel to the three members of the commission not already holding official position.

When the next Congress convened on the first Monday in December 1923, I introduced House Joint Resolution 128, which contained the same language as House Joint Resolution 300 of the previous Congress. Pursuant to the provisions of House Joint Resolution 128, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, hearings were conducted and I, by request of the Honorable John C. McKenzie, the chairman of the committee, examined the witnesses and assembled the material, and the hearings were published by the committee under the caption, "Universal Mobilization for War Purposes." These hearings constituted a volume of 250 pages.

As a result of the hearings a report was filed by myself for the Committee on Military Affairs, and the same is hereby reproduced for the information of the Congress of the United States and the country:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 128) to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minify the profits of war, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

This resolution explains its object and purpose. The desirability of accomplishing the end sought is well expressed in the inaugural address of President Warren G. Harding, March 4, 1921, as follows:

"Our supreme task is the resumption of our onward, normal way. Reconstruction, readjustment, restoration—all these must follow. I would like to hasten them. If it will lighten the spirit and add to the resolution with which we take up the task, let me repeat for our Nation, we shall give no people just cause to make war upon us; we hold no national prejudice; we entertain no spirit of revenge; we do not hate; we do not covet; we dream of no conquest nor boast of armed prowess.

"If, despite this attitude, war is again forced upon us, I earnestly hope a way may be found which will unify our individual and collective strength and consecrate all America, materially and spiritually, body and soul, to national defense. I can vision the ideal republic, where every man and woman is called under the flag for assignment to duty for whatever service, military or civic, the individual is best fitted; where we may call to universal service every plant, agency, or facility, all in the sublime sacrifice for country, and not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, corporation, or combination, but all above the normal shall flow into the defense chest of the Nation. There is something inherently wrong, something out of accord with the ideals of representative democracy, when one portion of our citizenship turns its activities to private gain amid defensive war while another is fighting, sacrificing, or dying for national preservation."

This sentiment was several times repeated by President Harding, and notably on December 8, 1922, in his message to Congress:

"The proposed survey of a plan to draft all the resources of the Republic, human and material, for national defense may well have your approval. I commended such a program in case of future war, in the inaugural address of March 4, 1921, and every experience in the adjustment and liquidation of war claims and settlement of war obligations persuades me we ought to be prepared for such universal call to armed defense."

The same principle has been several times endorsed by national conventions of the American Legion.

There appeared before the committee to express approval of the result aimed at by the resolution and by H. R. 194, by Representative French et al., and H. R. 4841, by Representative Johnson, South Dakota, numbers of prominent citizens and public officials, including Hon. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce; Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of the Navy; Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Assistant Secretary of War; Mr. William B. Colver, formerly Chairman of Federal Trade Commission and member of Price Fixing Commission during the World War; Mr. R. S. Brookings, LL. D., Chairman of Price Fixing Commission during the World War; Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, Chairman of War Industries Board during the World War; Mr. Edward F. McGrady, representative of American Federation of Labor; Col. John D. Marky, national chairman of legislative committee of the American Legion; Hon. John M. Evans, Representative from Montana; Hon. Royal C. Johnson, Representative from South Dakota; Hon. Charles L. Richards, Representative from Nevada; and Hon. Burton L. French, Representative from Idaho.

The hearings have been somewhat extensive for the purpose of ascertaining the facts relating to profiteering during previous wars, and especially during the World War, in order to understand the better what laws and legislative agencies are necessary to prevent a recurrence of such inequalities and unfairness while making war. It is highly desirable that remedial and regulatory legislation be adopted during the present Congress while the success and mistakes of the recent war are fresh in our minds, and especially while there are yet in Congress and in the public service generally many of those who participated in legislation and administration during the recent war period.

There is another strong and convincing reason for enacting into law the result of experiences in conducting war now, far in advance of another war. That reason is manifest. If we wait for the outbreak of another war, those persons then in Congress will have but faint and uncertain recollection of the governmental agencies set up during the World War to coordinate transportation, production by industries, mines, forests, and farms, and buying and consumption by the military and civilian populations. The result may and probably will be that in the rush and excitement of commencing war utterly inadequate legislation will be formulated to prevent the outrage of profiteering in war, whereby some citizens, equally bound in moral and patriotic spirit to sacrifice for the country's defense, will grow rich, many of them immensely rich, while other citizens, perhaps millions of them, are under arms, suffering the hardships of the field and trench, blistering under torrid heat or freezing with Arctic coldness, being gassed, wounded, killed. Such inequality or burden in democratic America, where all have enjoyed so many blessings, is an injustice that we must not permit to be repeated.

The exact legal methods and machinery whereby to accomplish the end invariably conceded to be highly desirable are not just yet clear to your committee. Therefore, without reporting any one of the pending bills, with or without amendments, we deem it best to recommend the adoption of House Joint Resolution 128, creating a commission to continue the study we have commenced and to formulate the language necessary to accomplish the desired results. That will involve knowledge, patience, concentration, and full opportunity for conference and counsel; this a commission sitting in the recess can have. The fruit of their labors will be before us in definite and well-thought-out form when we reconvene in December. A vote for the creation of this proposed commission is merely an expression of approval of the general principle that "In war, as among the citizens of America, there should be equal service and equal sacrifice for all and special profits to none."

As a well-nigh ideal program of effective preparedness the proposition will appeal to all seeking to insure national defense. It will mean that on the outbreak of war our skeleton organization for the human, material, and financial resources of the country is ready-made. There will be universal cooperation, and we will be able to strike an instant and concentrated blow with the vast powers of the entire Nation, insuring speedy and complete victory.

But as a war deterrent it is bound to prove efficacious. Undoubtedly certain interests that have profited hugely by previous wars are, to speak mildly, not averse to the recurrence of war. These same interests or sympathetic interests own and control most of the great daily newspapers of the country, and these, without specific war intent, are apt to influence the public mind out of a desire to satisfy a popular craving for the sensational. But if these interests understood in advance of war that they would have to make sacrifices and bear burdens and suffer losses, and not make huge profits as heretofore, then such interests would prescribe that these newspapers controlled by them shall not unduly and unnecessarily alarm the public mind. In such case the newspapers would caution prudence and toleration and forbearance to the last.

Since no group of citizens will then have any motive to stir up an aggressive war, and other nations will be very slow to attack or outrage the rights of a nation so prepared to make prompt and cooperative effective defense, war will become very remote and improbable. We do not contend that all wars will be prevented. That is yet impossible in the present state of human development.

Again, in the event of an inevitable, unpreventable war of national defense, there will also be harmonious spiritual cooperation among all citizens, because all become defenders, whether in uniform or not, and some will not feel a sense of injustice and unfairness arising from inequality. After the war there will be no heartburnings, recriminations, and demand for adjusted compensation. The Nation will resume its normal labors where it left off. There will be absent during and after the war the usual carnival of corruption and bribery. If Government officials have no contracts to let carrying great profits, there will be no motive to offer a bribe. There will not be a new class of very rich made from war profits. All will equally and sincerely rejoice at the conclusion of war and the coming of peace, because it will mean the end of suffering and sacrifice for all.

Thereafter, in each succeeding Congress I introduced a resolution of similar purport, but failing to obtain favorable action on same I finally persuaded my friend and colleague the Honorable J. Mayhew Wainwright, then a Representative from the State of New York, but formerly Assistant Secretary of War, to introduce the resolution in the House, and Senator David A. Reed, from the State of Pennsylvania, introduced substantially the same resolution in the Senate. The resolution having passed and having been approved by President Hoover, there was appointed what became known as the "War Policies Commission", and the personnel of that Commission was as follows:

War Policies Commission: Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley, Chairman; Secretary of Navy Charles F. Adams; Secretary of Agriculture Arthur M. Hyde; Secretary of Commerce Robert P. Lamont; Secretary of Labor William N. Doak; the Attorney General William DeWitt Mitchell. United States Senate: David A. Reed, Pennsylvania, Vice Chairman; Arthur H. Vandenberg, Michigan; Joseph T. Robinson, Arkansas; Claude A. Swanson, Virginia. House of Representatives: Lindley H. Hadley, Washington, Secretary; William P. Holaday, Illinois; Ross A. Collins, Mississippi; John J. McSwain, South Carolina.

The War Policies Commission began its hearings on March 5, 1931, and its hearings filled three modest volumes of printed material, and finally on March 7, 1932, said Commission submitted the following report:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 7, 1932.

REPORT OF THE WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

The final recommendations of the Commission created by a congressional resolution entitled "Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war" have been submitted by the Commission.

Twelve of the fourteen members of the Commission signed the recommendations. Of the two members not signing one is attending the Disarmament Conference in Geneva, and the other prepared a minority report.

On December 4, 1931, there was submitted to the President a preliminary report concerning the Commission's activities. An extension of time for the preparation of conclusions and recommendations was requested and granted in order that certain studies concerning constitutional law could be carried to completion. The Attorney General and others have carefully investigated the legal phases of the questions involved, and their conclusions were considered by the Commission in formulating its final report.

During the course of its deliberations the Commission held a series of open hearings, at which many witnesses advanced diverse proposals and opinions bearing upon the intricate problems that presented themselves for study. The names of these witnesses and the complete testimony submitted by each accompanied the preliminary report.

MARCH 3, 1932.

To the PRESIDENT:

The Commission appointed under Public Resolution No. 98, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war", respectfully submits the following report and recommendations:

First. We recommend, in order to eliminate all doubt concerning the extent of the power of the Congress to prevent profiteering and to stabilize prices in time of war, that a proposed constitutional amendment clearly defining such power be submitted by the Congress to the States.

Second. We further recommend that until a constitutional amendment be adopted clearly defining the power of Congress to prevent profiteering and to stabilize prices in time of war, the following program be adopted as governmental policy in order effectively to minimize the profits of war and to distribute its burdens and sacrifices equitably:

(a) That the Congress should empower the President, in the event of war, to institute a program under which prices may be stabilized and thereafter adjusted at such levels as will minimize inflation and will secure to the Government the use of any private property needed in the prosecution of the war without affording the owner thereof profit due to the war. It should be clearly stated that such a program will not be placed in operation until Congress specifically directs it as a necessary measure in the conduct of the war.

(b) The Congress should empower the President to make, in war, such readjustments in, and additions to, the executive departments of the Government as are necessary to assure adequate control of all national resources. The President should be empowered also to fix the status, for the period of the war, of personnel transferred under this authority, from one bureau or department of the Government to any other.

(c) Existing law empowering the President to compel acceptance of war orders and to commandeer property should be continued.

(d) In addition to all other plans to remove the profits of war, the revenue law should provide that, upon any declaration of war and during the period of such emergency, individuals and corporations shall be taxed 95 percent of all income above the previous 3-year average, with proper adjustments for capital expenditures for war purposes by existing or new industries.

(e) In time of peace continuous planning by the Federal Government, particularly by the War and Navy Departments, should be directed toward insuring:

(1) That upon declaration of war there shall be immediately available to the Congress accurate and detailed estimates concerning the man power and material needs of the military and naval services, together with detailed studies and recommendations concerning the most applicable methods for mobilizing the necessary men and procuring the required munitions.

(2) That there shall be no competitive bidding between Government agencies for the products of industry.

(3) There shall be no placing of contracts in excess of needs.

(4) That cost-plus-percentage methods of purchase shall be eliminated.

(5) That the munitions-production load shall be distributed properly over the United States.

(6) That the governmental organizations required in the administration of war functions shall be set up promptly.

(7) That the necessary controls respecting prices, raw materials, transportation, priorities, war trade, finance, and related matters shall be continuously studied, so that in the event of war the will of Congress may be promptly and efficiently administered.

(f) Plans prepared in the War and Navy Departments for the accomplishment of the above should be continually revised to meet changing national and international conditions, and should be thoroughly examined and revised at least every 2 years by appropriate congressional committees.

Third. We recommend that no constitutional amendment to permit the taking of private property in time of war without compensation be considered by the Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

Patrick J. Hurley, chairman; David A. Reed, vice chairman; Joe T. Robinson; John J. McSwain; Arthur H. Vandenberg; William Mitchell; C. F. Adams; R. P. Lamont; Wm. P. Holaday; Arthur W. Hyde; W. N. Doak; Lindley H. Handley, secretary.

(Absent: Senator Claude A. Swanson, attending the conference in Geneva.)

---

To the PRESIDENT:

The purpose in creating the so-called "War Policies Commission" was to "study and consider amending the Constitution of the United States to provide that private property may be taken by Congress for public use during war and methods of equalizing the burdens and to remove the profits of war, together with a study of policies to be pursued in the event of war."

I take it that the object of the resolution creating the Commission deals solely with the purpose of eliminating profits that accrue to certain classes of individuals and corporations during war, and that "a study of policies to be pursued in the event of war" relates to policies to be prescribed by Congress either through a constitutional amendment or by legislation for the purpose of eliminating war profits.

As the Constitution of the United States is now drawn, I am convinced that the only way to eliminate war profits is through the adoption of a constitutional amendment so as to enable Congress to pass legislation creating an agency to fix prices of commodities either for the purpose of keeping profits at a minimum or the entire elimination of them. I heartily favor the adoption of a constitutional amendment to carry out this object.

I do not believe it was the intention of Congress that the power to fix prices of commodities should be delegated to military men. I believe that such administrative matters should be entirely in the hands of civilians, and I object to any recommendation that would tend to confer upon military men the power to regulate prices or the activities of the civilian population during war or at any other time. I am firmly convinced, whether intended or not, that any war planning as now carried on by the War Department will in the end result in the administration of price-fixing laws and the regulation of civilian activities by military and naval officers if the recommendations of the majority members of the Commission are finally adopted by Congress.

I regret that I am unable to follow the majority of the members of the Commission upon all of their proposals, and respectfully submit to you this dissent.

Very respectfully,

ROSS A. COLLINS.

I hereby report an address delivered by me before the annual Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution in April 1926. It is substantially the same address as was delivered by me in September 1924 at the Interparliamentary Union in Geneva, Switzerland. Furthermore, the same address was printed in the Advocate of Peace, a magazine published by the American Peace Society, in April 1927. I am offering this material for the consideration of the Members of Congress, because the President has announced to the country that he will make it one of his major objectives at this session of Congress to secure the enactment of legislation to prevent that conscienceless and well-nigh treasonable conduct of some selfish citizens in taking advantage of the necessities of the Government and of the people in time of war to make unreasonable and excessive profits. Here follows the article:

ONE PART OF THE PEACE PROGRAM

(By Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN, Member of Congress from South Carolina)

The problem of peace, like all questions where the factors are human, is many-sided. There is no single specific to cure the social ill called "war." I am offering the following thoughts on one aspect of the case, especially as it relates to the "will to peace":

The Constitution of the United States has been universally appraised as the highest perfection of wisdom yet attained among the fundamental documents of government. Many particular parts have been singled out from time to time for special consideration and commendation. I do not remember ever to have seen any particular discussion of the wisdom and significance of having lodged the power to declare war in the Congress. Among all the older nations of the world the power to declare and commence war had been lodged exclusively with the executive power, so that kings and emperors had made war, from time immemorial, to suit their own interests, ambitions, or whims, and consulted the representatives of the people, if any there were, only after the commencement of war, in order to procure the financial resources wherewith to carry on such war.

But the erection of the American Republic of Republics, the commencement of a great federal state in this Western Hemisphere, had as a background the fundamental conception of the Declaration of Independence, that "governments rest upon the consent of the governed", and exist to secure the life, liberty, and property of the people. Therefore, it was but a logical application of this fundamental premise that the Constitution makers should propose, and that the people in their several State conventions should accept, a constitution that lodged the war-making power in all the representatives of all the States.

THE PEOPLE, THROUGH CONGRESS, DECLARE WAR

The President alone conducts diplomatic relations with other nations, but the President can make treaties only by and with the consent of two-thirds of all the Senators. This was a hitherto unthought-of limitation upon Executive power. It had, therefore, been conceived as preposterous that the people's representatives should have a veto power in the making of treaties between the royal rulers. But this limitation of power is constantly in the minds of Presidents and their executive advisers in the negotiation of treaties, and doubtless has ever been a wholesome and restraining influence. Though the President is unrestrained in conducting international affairs, yet he must and does feel constantly the restraining check that his international policies cannot be enforced with physical power in war without the approval of both Houses of Congress. But the principle runs still further back.

The President must calculate upon receiving the approval of an overwhelming majority of the individual citizens of the Republic. It is constantly in his thinking that Members of Congress must respect and heed the wishes and feelings of their constituents. The President remembers that Members of the House of Representatives are all elected every 2 years, and that one-third of all the Senators are elected every 2 years. Therefore the President must be so cautious and prudent in handling international situations as to feel sure that the same will be approved by a clear majority of the people. If the President fails to take these fundamental conceptions into consideration and rushes headlong and unadvised into complications with foreign countries that can be settled only by use of physical force, he may find himself greatly embarrassed by failing to receive the support of the Congress and be, therefore, compelled to retreat from his diplomatic predicament.

NO AGGRESSIVE WAR BY AMERICA

This particular lodgment of the war-making power in the hands of the representatives of the people insures our Nation against a policy of aggression. The Constitution makers all knew, from either personal experience or close observation, the horrors and demoralizing and destructive attributes of war. But they were wise men and realized the forces that had been operating upon mankind and among nations since long before the beginning of recorded history. Our forefathers, who laid the foundation of this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, well knew the ambitions and covetousness that from time to time seize the rulers and ruling classes of nations. Wisely, therefore, did they lodge in the central Federal Government the sole and exclusive power of declaring, conducting, and concluding war.

Many powers of sovereignty were left and some still remain with the several States. But in the interest of the general welfare and common defense the war-making power was placed with the one government that represents all the people of all the sections. This Constitution conferred upon the Federal Government not only the power to declare and carry on war but the power to raise armies and the power to support armies. The Constitution likewise conferred on this Central Government the power to provide a navy and to maintain a navy. There is far-reaching significance in these words, to "support an army" and to "maintain a navy." They imply more than enlisting men and building ships. They imply the power to acquire by the exercise of the supreme and absolute sovereignty that must rest in any nation to take whatever physical resources and materials that may, in the judgment of the Federal Government, be necessary for the proper support of that army and for the proper maintenance of that navy.

NO VETO BY THE PEOPLE AFTER WAR IS DECLARED

Some have argued that while the Constitution says that Congress may raise armies, it means that it may only open recruiting stations and offer compensation and, by a beating of drums and waving of flags, try to induce men to volunteer to enter the Federal Army. It has been argued that to confine the raising of armies to the volunteer system would be a wise and salutary restraint upon Congress in declaring war, so that the people, by refusing to volunteer, could virtually veto a declaration of war by Congress. But the Supreme Court of the United States has in several cases solemnly and unequivocally sustained the power of Congress to reach, with supreme and sovereign hand, and take, by selective-service draft, such human instrumentalities, either men or women, as the Congress may in the exercise of its power declare to be essential to the raising of armies in order to provide for the common defense.

By the same reasoning, by the same inescapable logic, it must follow that the power to support the armies thus raised is unlimited and unrestrained and may be exercised at the uncontrollable discretion of Congress. It therefore remains only for the Congress, with the approval of the President, to say how these armies, raised to defend the Nation's life, shall be supported.

POWER TO TAKE WAR SUPPLIES

Heretofore the usual policy of the Government in the supporting of armies has been the volunteer system. People have been begged and cajoled into buying bonds essential to finance armies in the field. By the same reasoning it has been argued that to leave the supporting of armies upon this volunteer basis would amount to leaving with the people the final veto power on war. Congress may declare the war, and may, by a selective-service draft, so formulated as to produce the least dislocation in the industrial and social life of the Nation, take those persons that may be best spared from the homes and the farms and the factories and the professions of the Nation; yet after the armies have been raised and are in the field and are at the front and are facing the foe, they may be totally paralyzed by the failure of the people back home to volunteer sufficient funds to continue the fight. Such contemplation sickens the heart of the genuine patriot. The same power that gives Congress the right to take the man from his family and from his farm and from his factory gives Congress the right to take such of the produce of the farm and such of the product of the factory as may be necessary to support and maintain the soldier in camp and in field and in trench.

PRUDENCE AND CAUTION IN DECLARING WAR

As Americans we believe in and insist upon freedom of opinion and freedom of expression of opinion, either by mouth or by the press. There should ever be the amplest discussion in Congress and in the country before war is commenced. All groups of opinion should be tolerantly heard. The President and the Members of Congress should solemnly contemplate all the possible consequences of an entry into war. They should patiently and prayerfully seek to avert war. Only actual defense of our physical integrity or of our national principles and honor, which are more than life itself, should ever provoke us to war. God has been good in gathering some of the choice pioneer spirits from many nations and planting them upon this new continent, free from the traditions and customs of the feudal nations, and in permitting them to develop here a civilization unrivaled in power and in variety in all the annals of time. The President and the Congress should and do contemplate the fact that the nations of the whole world are becoming so interrelated by commerce and communication as to make it practically impossible to localize war. The war from 1914 to 1918 is universally described as the World War, and yet it may be fairly concluded that its vast proportions will be far exceeded by the next clash among the nations. Like a prairie or forest fire, when once the fury of war commences, no limits can be set, no bounds prescribed, no time fixed, and no measure set.

WAR, ONCE DECLARED, BINDS EACH AND ALL

But after all voices have been heard in the Nation, after the President, with full realization of the responsibility, has pronounced the situation such that war alone is the answer; after the Congress, conscious of direct responsibility to the people, shall have declared war, then, in my humble opinion, the case is foreclosed, judgment has been rendered, the matter has had its day in court, and henceforth no man dare deny his individual obligation to contribute to the utmost limit of his power, either by direct participation as a soldier or by direct contribution to the material and financial support of the Army and Navy. From the very moment that Congress, representing all, declares war, it binds every citizen, whatever may be his private and individual judgment of the merits. It becomes the law of the land, and henceforth the only course for every person is to help to fight it through. There must be no vetoing of this war-making power in Congress. If adequate volunteers do not rush to the colors, the country may command her sons and daughters and compel them to go. If adequate resources are not voluntarily contributed, then by the same power, for the same purposes, the Congress can take whatever the Army and Navy may need in order that the full force of the military power may be exerted.

JUST COMPENSATION FOR ALL PROPERTY TAKEN

But we are reminded that one part of this very same Constitution, to wit, the fifth amendment, declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation therefor. When properly understood, the fifth amendment offers no obstacle to the war-making power of our Government.

It does not provide that private property shall never be taken for a public purpose but merely prescribes that payment shall be made therefor. Such provision is wise and just. It would be manifestly unfair to take one man's factory, or one man's railroad, or one man's coal mine, or one man's farm, or one man's steamboat and use the same in carrying on war and make no adequate compensation for the use thereof, while other citizens, under equal obligation to help carry on war, have their factories, or their railroads, or their coal mines, or their farms, or their steamboats untouched or unharmed. But the fifth amendment does not say that the property shall be paid for before its use, and merely provides that at some time just compensation shall be made. Therefore, in the emergency, whatever property is needed may be taken, and taken instantly, and thereafter just compensation made, and that compensation must be just not only to the owner but also just to the public that pays. "Justice" means fairness and reasonableness under the circumstances. Therefore justice requires that no fabulous, fictitious, and inflated war-time prices shall be paid for property taken and used. The same principle was applied in making just compensation for "man power" during the recent World War. Congress had prescribed the monthly pay for soldiers to range from $30 a month upward. But after the war good conscience and justice, not legal obligation, declared that such compensation was inadequate, and, after much discussion, Congress passed legislation to adjust and pay additional compensation for the services of the soldiers. There was no constitutional obligation to do this.

Congress may draft the soldiers without providing one single cent of compensation, even during the period of service. But would Congress do such an unjust thing? Members of Congress know that they are answerable to the soldiers, and under our system of government the voice of the people is finally supreme. Therefore do the provisions of the fifth amendment merely conform to the ideals of republican institutions and demand a just exercise of the war-making power.

EQUALIZE BURDENS OF WAR THROUGH POWER TO TAX

But Congress has another power, unrestrained, unlimited, both in war and in peace, and this power may be exercised to insure justice in distribution of the burdens of war. It is the power to levy and collect taxes. It is a fact that many do not realize that about 40 percent of the revenue raised and expended by our Government during the period of the recent war was raised by taxation. Many conservative and experienced and well-informed men who had intimate contact with the administration during the war have expressed the opinion that if there had been no inflation of prices, if a peace-time average of prices had been maintained by force of law during the war, the money cost of the war would have been reduced by at least one-half. The average price level of all commodities during the World War was nearly two and a half times the average peace-time price. Bringing these two facts together, we find that if prices had not become so much inflated, we could have financed the war merely upon the taxes that were collected and without the issue of a single bond; and if we had done so, we would have been today debt-free and would not have a mortgage in the form of bonds upon the earning power of the people of this country aggregating more than $20,000,000,000 that will require the labors of two or three generations to discharge.

NO DRAFTING OF LABORERS

There has been much confusion of thought and much loose and ill-considered utterance in connection with the subject of what is commonly described as "universal draft", and "universal mobilization", and "drafting of wealth to make war", and other phrases of like import. Some, with sweeping and irresponsible generalization, have declared that the whole Nation, with all her resources, must be instantly militarized, that martial law must prevail everywhere, and that men and women, old and young, even children, with all that they have, must be considered as in one mighty camp, subject to military discipline, to do and to give whatever those in authority may direct. Some have leveled their anathemas at men who labor with their hands and have heretofore received wages of 8 and 10 and 15 dollars a day for work as civilians, while soldiers were suffering and dying in the trenches at a dollar a day. Others have directed their maledictions at the wholesalers and forestallers and engrossers and speculators and manipulators who cornered the market for essential commodities and demanded and received fabulous prices and profits, became millionaires in a day, and thus capitalized and commercialized the calamity of war and grew rich out of the necessities and sacrifices and sufferings of the Nation.

I feel compelled to say that progress in the direction of legislation, looking to a fairer and more just and more equal distribution of the hardships and inconveniences and sufferings of war, has been delayed by reason of the excessive claims and demands of some of the advocates of such legislation. Personally, I believe it would be unwise and imprudent and impracticable to undertake the conscription and militarization of manual laborers, whether for use upon shipbuilding, or housebuilding, or roadbuilding, or factory working, or farm working, or elsewhere. It is my belief that only the fighting forces and those agencies directly contributory thereto, such as medical, quartermaster, etc., should be taken from the civilian population by selective-service draft. To do otherwise would greatly dislocate, and might paralyze, industry, mining, and agriculture. The military authorities would not and could not know how to distribute the workers among the factories and farms. The psychological factor must not be ignored. Human beings are not machines. They have feelings and thoughts. There are limits beyond which they will not endure. The overwhelming majority of the people must first be convinced that a war is just and worthy of any sacrifice, even death, and then, when it is declared, public opinion, as well as force of law, will compel the acquiescence of any small dissenting minority into conformity with the plans and efforts of the Nation to raise and support and maintain the armies and navies.

NO MILITARIZATION OF INDUSTRIES

In like manner, enthusiasts and idealists have maintained that all the material property and all the financial resources of the Nation must be instantly poured into a mighty national war hopper, there to be employed as military experts may determine necessary in the conduct of war. Such a proposition is preposterous to practical minds. The men who in peace time have built and operated industries can operate them more efficiently in war than Army officers can. They know how to manage labor in order to get the most satisfactory results. If all property were appropriated and commandeered and dumped into the war machine, of course, there would be no incomes to be taxed, and, consequently, no sources of revenue wherewith to pay that just compensation required by the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

A SANE PROGRAM OF JUSTICE

Then what is a fair and reasonable program for the conduct of war so as to bring about a more just and equal distribution of the burdens of war? We believe that the war is the whole Nation's business. It is not the affair merely of those in the Army or the Navy. The soldiers and sailors have no more at stake than the civilians back home. The war is everybody's business. If the cause of the war is not such as to justify a contribution to the limit of his qualifications and capacities and resources by every citizen, then we ought not to be in the war, and Congress should carefully consider this aspect of the problem before declaring war. But this equalization cannot be theoretically and mathematically exact and ideal.

It is a practical world we live in, and war is an abnormal condition and, fortunately, very occasional and temporary, and should be so conducted as to result in the minimum of dislocation and demoralization of the existing order of things. Therefore, in addition to the exercise of the power of drafting soldiers and sailors by selective service, and in addition to the power to commandeer and take necessary physical property without delay, subject to consequent compensation, there are two outstanding measures that should be taken at the outbreak of another war. We should have our minds made up in advance on these matters and, if possible, the outlines of general legislation should be placed upon the statute books now and we should not wait until the heat and excitement and the tumult of war in order to legislate. The first of these is the stabilization of all prices. This can and must be done by the fiat of law. Only the emergency of war could justify such an artificial and unnatural mandate.

STOP PROFITEERING BY STABILIZING PRICES

The stabilization of prices as contemplated by those familiar with the details essential to carry out this program of seeking to equalize the burdens and inconveniences of war is not price fixing as ordinarily understood. It does not mean picking out different commodities and prescribing by statute the prices for which the same may be sold. But it does mean taking the prices of all commodities as they are found and ascertained to prevail in a free market at a fixed date, say, 90 days before the declaration of war, and prescribing that the prices so prevailing shall be observed in transactions between citizens and in transaction of citizens with the Government.

This is fair and just. The price of any commodity is a relative matter, economically considered. The real price is the quantity of commodity or service that must be given for a given commodity or the quantity of service or commodity that may be received for a given commodity. The excuse made during the war for the pyramiding of prices was that the raw material and labor, rent and interest, and other factors going into other commodities had risen and were continuing to rise, and, in order to meet these rises, the prices of manufactured articles must be raised. In turn, labor contended that what it had to buy and the rents it had to pay had gone up and it must have more wages. The merchants claimed that not only had commodities advanced but store rents advanced, clerk hire advanced, and taxes advanced, so that they must increase prices. These retail prices again, in their turn, affected the wages of the laborers and the prices of raw materials. So this vicious circle swung rapidly around, rising constantly higher and higher, to the terrific peak of more than 250 percent of normal prices. The stabilization of prices will eliminate such excuses for price boosting, and the result will be equality and fairness to all parties concerned.

PAY-AS-YOU-FIGHT PROGRAM

The next step that practical men, bent upon seeking, so far as possible, the ideal of justice among all citizens in the duty to make and carry on war, is to understand in advance that taxes, heavy taxes, burdensome taxes, will be imposed to meet the current expenses of the war. The slogan should be, as far as possible, to "pay as you fight", so that as the soldier sacrifices time and blood and life in carrying on at the front, the taxpayer back home, conducting his business, living with his family, shall contribute from his substance the material things necessary to satisfy the current demands of the fighting forces.

The issue of bonds to finance the war should be reduced to a minimum, if not entirely eliminated. Undoubtedly the tremendous inflation of credit and currency and prices during the World War was due in part to the stupendous issue of bonds. These bonds were largely carried by being floated at the banks, and the credit and currency of the people were almost doubled. But some may protest that to stabilize prices would eliminate war profiteering, and to eliminate bond issues would prevent inflation, so that there would be no unusual stimulus to business and, in fact, there might be an apparent stagnation, thus resulting in a diminution of incomes, which, in turn, would result in a diminution of income taxes; and if the war should be financed as fought, taxes might be so heavy as to amount in fact to a capital levy. That chain of argument is considered by its makers as reducing the pay-as-you-fight proposition to an ad absurdum. But I refuse to be frightened by the thought of even a capital levy in order to carry on war. At most it can but mean that a very small percentage of the existing capital reserves of the people shall be taken for the extraordinary and urgent needs of the Government in time of war.

HUMAN LIFE HIGHER THAN MATERIAL PROPERTY

Does not the man at the front, and all those under arms cooperating with him to make his fight effective, submit to a capital levy to a very real and even terrific degree? The best part of the assets and capital of the young man is his body, his health, his time—yea, his life. In order to defend the Nation, in order to make it secure to every man and woman within its bounds, in order that all may equally enjoy the blessings of this Nation the strongest and best of our young men are called out to give in unstinted measure the riches and vested rights of health and strength and life.

Is it fair, is it just, is it in conformity with that fundamental American conception of equality of rights and equality of obligations that some of our citizens should be called upon to give their all to defend the Nation's rights and life and others, at the same time, be not called upon to make a sacrifice of a small proportion of accumulated capital? I recall these words from the inaugural address of President Warren G. Harding, March 4, 1921: "There is something inherently wrong, something out of accord with the ideals of representative democracy, when one portion of our citizenship turns its activities to private gain amid defensive war while another portion is fighting, sacrificing, or dying for the national defense."

JUSTICE A FACTOR IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

To make effective such a program tending toward a just and fair distribution of the burdens of war is the greatest step in the scheme of national defense. It will mean that all the resources of the Nation will be directed instantly upon the outbreak of war to the making and gathering of such a combination of human, material, and financial resources as must be well-nigh irresistible. Further, it will mean that among the men who are fighting and directing, among those sacrificing and suffering, there will not rankle that sense of injustice and of unfairness at the thought that others are not only escaping from the obligations of such a service but are actually commercializing the Nation's needs and profiteering upon the Nation's peril. There is an inherent and indefinable consciousness in every human breast of what is just and fair and right. Education may clarify its definition, but can neither create nor destroy its existence.

"PAY AS YOU FIGHT" AND NO PROFITEERING INSURE PRUDENCE

While this program of invoking all the resources of the Nation to cooperate in one combined effort of war when war is inevitable insures military efficiency, yet it is at the same time one of the surest guaranties that our Nation will never embark upon an aggressive and unjust war. We are a peace-loving people. We know that we may best accomplish our mission to build up a great Christian civilization for the blessing of our own people and to serve as a shining example to all others only while peace prevails. But we are vividly conscious of our obligation to the ideals of the Republic. We feel that these ideals can only be achieved under conditions of undisputed national security. Much as we love peace and will insist to the limits of patience upon its preservation, yet, as a practical people knowing the plain lessons of history and the teachings of bitter experience, we refuse to live in a fool's paradise and to bury our heads in the sands of a false sense of security. But the program here outlined, of no war profits and of heavy war taxes, will prove an efficacious deterrent to the rash and ill-considered agitation of chauvinists and militarists. It will compel certain great financial interests that control the mighty metropolitan dailies to think carefully and to speak mildly in crucial times. If the capital that controls newspapers knows that it cannot profit and may suffer some of the burdens of war, it will be cautious and prudent in editorial utterances. The man on the street who knows that he is unfit by age or physical infirmity to bear a soldier's part in war will restrain his tongue and no longer agitate for war if he realizes that he must contribute of his substance, even to the point of sacrifice, in order to carry on the war.

RIGHTEOUS WAR OF DEFENSE

With all selfish motives of pride and profit by war eliminated, with the hysteria and delirium of war excitement checked and restrained by the thought of heavy financial burdens, we may feel sure that one motive, and one motive only, may ever impel the good people of this great Republic to take up arms against another nation. That motive will be the defense of either the physical integrity or of the international rights of the Nation. With a war caused by and based upon such a condition, with a situation confronting all the people that means either supine submission to a foreign will or fighting in defense of the Nation's rights and life, there can be no question but that any war declared by Congress will be a just war. Being just, being righteous, being backed by the heart and conscience of the overwhelming majority of the people, the law of selective service for human beings and a law to prevent profiteering by the stabilization of prices and to require the equitable contribution of the sinews of war by those having capital will not be a heartless mandate to compel the sullen obedience of the people to a harsh war program, but will be merely the legal measure of what all the people will cheerfully do to defend the Nation's cause.

A NEW AMERICAN SLOGAN

Therefore, are we not justified in advancing one step further in the crystallization of national ideals into well-remembered phrases that express the heart and soul of Americanism? For more than 125 years American citizens of all sections and of all parties have acknowledged that the essence of American institutions finds a voice in the phrase: "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." To that incomparable expression of the peace-time policies of our Nation let us now, while the lessons of the late war are still fresh in every mind and heart, write upon the statute books of this Republic laws looking toward the equalization of the obligations and hardships of war, and phrase this other epitome of the American war-time policy thus: "Equal burdens and equal sacrifices for all and special privileges and special profits to none."

(The Commission thereupon adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, may we not have a call of the Senate before the motion is submitted?

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Copeland | Johnson | Pope |
| Ashurst | Costigan | Keyes | Radcliffe |
| Austin | Couzens | King | Reynolds |
| Bachman | Cutting | Lewis | Robinson |
| Bailey | Davis | Logan | Russell |
| Bankhead | Dickinson | Lonergan | Schall |
| Barkley | Dieterich | Long | Schwellenbach |
| Bilbo | Donahey | Maloney | Sheppard |
| Black | Duffy | McCarran | Shipstead |
| Bone | Fletcher | McGill | Smith |
| Borah | George | McNary | Steiwer |
| Brown | Gerry | Metcalf | Thomas, Okla. |
| Bulkley | Glass | Minton | Thomas, Utah |
| Bulow | Gore | Moore | Trammell |
| Burke | Guffey | Murphy | Truman |
| Byrnes | Hale | Murray | Vandenberg |
| Capper | Harrison | Neely | Van Nuys |
| Caraway | Hastings | Norris | Wagner |
| Connally | Hatch | O'Mahoney | Wheeler |
| Coolidge | Hayden | Pittman | White |

Mr. LEWIS. I have been requested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to announce his absence today, occasioned by illness, and to say that he will be present tomorrow to carry out his intention of addressing the Senate as contemplated.

I announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator-elect from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], all being engaged on a Philippine commission.

I announce the absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] occasioned by illness.

I also announce the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is detained in his home State on official business.

The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. My colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent in the Philippine Islands on the business of the Senate.

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is necessarily absent on account of a death in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to proceed to the election of the President pro tempore is the pending question.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I submit a privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 12) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. KEY PITTMAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, be, and he hereby is, elected President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold office during the pleasure of the Senate, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate adopted on the 12th day of March 1890 on the subject.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution by striking out the name of Senator PITTMAN and substituting therefor the name of Senator VANDENBERG.

Mr. ROBINSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN (when Mr. GIBSON's name was called). I have heretofore announced the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. GIBSON], which announcement I should like to have stand for the day. My colleague has a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HASTINGS (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], and to state that if present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I have been requested to state that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], and the Senator-elect from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are all necessarily absent; and if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. METCALF (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—15

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Austin | Davis | Keyes | Schall |
| Capper | Dickinson | McNary | Steiwer |
| Couzens | Hale | Metcalf | White |
| Cutting | Hastings | Norris | |

NAYS—63

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Connally | Johnson | Radcliffe |
| Ashurst | Coolidge | King | Reynolds |
| Bachman | Copeland | Lewis | Robinson |
| Bailey | Costigan | Logan | Russell |
| Bankhead | Dieterich | Lonergan | Schwellenbach |
| Barkley | Donahey | Long | Sheppard |
| Bilbo | Duffy | Maloney | Shipstead |
| Black | Fletcher | McCarran | Smith |
| Bone | George | McGill | Thomas, Okla. |
| Borah | Gerry | Minton | Thomas, Utah |
| Brown | Glass | Moore | Trammell |
| Bulkley | Gore | Murphy | Truman |
| Bulow | Guffey | Murray | Van Nuys |
| Burke | Harrison | Neely | Wagner |
| Byrnes | Hatch | O'Mahoney | Wheeler |
| Caraway | Hayden | Pope | |

NOT VOTING—16

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Barbour | Frazier | Norbeck | Townsend |
| Byrd | Gibson | Nye | Tydings |
| Carey | La Follette | Overton | Vandenberg |
| Clark | McAdoo | Pittman | Walsh |

So Mr. MCNARY's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN, escorted by Mr. ROBINSON, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office was administered to him.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON submitted a resolution (S. Res. 13), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be notified of the election of Hon. KEY PITTMAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, as President of the Senate pro tempore.

NOTIFICATION TO HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. ROBINSON submitted a resolution (S. Res. 14), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be notified of the election of Hon. KEY PITTMAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, as President of the Senate pro tempore.

STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I offer a privileged resolution, and ask that it be read and considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 15), as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Committee on Pensions, to consist of 10 Senators.
"Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to consist of 19 Senators.
"Committee on Printing, to consist of seven Senators, which shall have power to act jointly with the same committee of the House of Representatives.
"Committee on Privileges and Elections, to consist of 17 Senators.
"Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to consist of 14 Senators, which shall have power to act jointly with the same committee of the House of Representatives.
"Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to consist of 15 Senators.
"Committee on Rules, to consist of 13 Senators.
"Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to consist of 17 Senators."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. On behalf of the majority, I submit the names which I send to the desk for membership on the various committees of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. On behalf of the Republican conference, I submit the minority assignments to the various committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The assignments will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the assignments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the two assignments will be considered together.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move the adoption of an order incorporating the names just read.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. ASHURST presented the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

STATE OF ARIZONA,
ELEVENTH LEGISLATURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THIRD SPECIAL SESSION.

House Memorial 4

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

We commend the earnest and sincere efforts of the administration to overcome the economic depression which for 5 years has held this Nation in its grip; which has paralyzed industry, destroyed commerce, deprived citizens of their homes, left workers without employment and reduced millions of producers from reasonable comfort and independence to penury and want.

But while we commend these efforts and the vision that conceived them, we must respectfully direct attention to the distressing fact that a deserving section of the Nation's citizenry which needs help most of all—the small farmer, the small dairyman, and the small stock raiser—has not been effectively aided.

Elaborate steps have been taken, through the medium of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Bankhead cotton-control bill to relieve the distress occasioned by mortgaged farms, and to finance farming operations, to systematize production, effect orderly marketing, and raise the prices of farm products. These legislative devices have no doubt been effective, but either the laws themselves or the rules and regulations under which they are administered have proven impotent to bring within the scope of their beneficent influence in the class to which reference is here made.

The terms under which the Government extends help to the farmer appear to be well adapted to the needs of the man who farms on a large scale. He can furnish a financial statement, show low-cost operation with modern equipment, often purchased out of the proceeds of his Government loan, and otherwise comply with the requirements of the lending agency. But the small farmer cannot meet the conditions imposed. He is unable to make the financial and technical showing required of him. He cannot furnish what might be termed a "bank set-up." He cannot show the low-cost production of the large operator. If he wishes to grow cotton or to participate in the benefit or rental provisions of the Bankhead Act, he is often unable to furnish the accurate records of production for previous years that are required of him. For these and other reasons beyond his control he is found to be ineligible for the assistance which goes to those who need it less. What is here said of the small farmer is true of the small dairyman and the small hog raiser. They, too, find it difficult if not impossible, to secure assistance, and continue to market their products at less than cost, while the prices of everything they buy have practically doubled.

As a consequence of this situation, hundreds of thousands of acres of fertile small farms are not being tilled. Many of their former owners or tenants, unable to secure financial aid to continue their farming and maintain their homes, have perforce moved with their families to the cities, where they are living at the cost of the public-welfare agencies. In numerous instances they have been dispossessed of their land, which has been added to the holdings of the large operators who are able to get Government aid.

It cannot be believed that such results were contemplated when the agricultural relief acts were written. It is believed that when the situation described is brought to the attention of the national administration and the Nation's lawmakers, corrective steps will be promptly taken.

Wherefore your memorialist prays that steps may be speedily taken to afford urgently needed relief to the small farmer, dairyman, and stock raiser, steps which will enable him to enjoy a measure of the assistance accorded to the large operators; which will make it possible for him to refinance himself under a practical amortization plan such as is embodied in the Frazier-Lemke bill, and, in addition, will enable the producer to realize at least cost on his product, while limiting the middleman, who to date is the chief beneficiary of the price-raising devices, to a reasonable profit, and afford protection to the consumer.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house December 6, 1934.

W. G. ROSENBAUM,
Speaker of the House.
LALLAH RUTH,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. ASHURST also presented the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

STATE OF ARIZONA,
ELEVENTH LEGISLATURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THIRD SPECIAL SESSION.

House Memorial 3

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

The operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has been of inestimable value to the State of Arizona by helping worthy citizens to avoid the loss of their homes, relieving creditors of their frozen assets, making possible the payment of delinquent taxes, creating employment and trade through the making of necessary repairs to home buildings, and stimulating many lines of industry. This activity of the Federal Government has proven to be a most constructive phase of the recovery program.

There are still many worthy Arizona home owners who require assistance of the sort which it is the function of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to extend if their homes are to be saved. Some eleven hundred legitimate applications for loans have been filed with the local office of this Corporation, but have received no consideration on account of the exhaustion of the funds provided for use by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Reports indicate that a similar condition exists in other States.

The situation is a critical one in this State, for private lending agencies have not yet seen fit to extend their operations to this field or to make loans on terms with which the distressed home owner can comply.

Wherefore, your memorialist prays that legislation be enacted at the approaching session of the Congress extending the operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and providing funds for the making of legitimate loans to worthy citizens whose homes are imperiled.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

House Memorial 5

To the President and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

Development of the vast resources of this Nation's waterways, to the country's enrichment, is an outstanding feature of the national administration's policy which commands our unstinted praise as a permanent policy no less than as an effective means of giving work in the existing emergency to many thousands of unemployed men.

The development of the lower Colorado River through the dredging of a deep-water channel from the head of the Gulf of California to the city of Yuma is a project which, since the earliest days of Arizona's existence as a Territory, has commanded the interest and excited the imagination of engineers.

This mammoth project, which would give to Arizona a deep-sea port, would be of inestimable importance to the Southwest and to the Nation, giving life, as it would, to the industries and multiplying the commerce of one of the richest parts of the country, and during the period of its construction affording employment to an army of engineers, artisans, and laborers.

It would appear that there could be no more auspicious time than the present, when progressive policies distinguish the attitude of a liberal Mexican Government, to approach the subject of an understanding by which that nation would consent to or cooperate in the construction of this waterway—an understanding which would be in full sympathy with the spirit of the Gadsden Treaty, signed December 30, 1853, which declares that "the vessels and citizens of the United States shall, in all time, have free and uninterrupted passage through the Gulf of California, to and from their possession situated north of the boundary line of the two countries, it being understood that this passage is to be by navigation in the Gulf of California and the River Colorado."

Wherefore, your memorialist prays that the subject of this mammoth development be given your earnest consideration, and that the Department of State be instructed to initiate negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Mexico looking to the consent of the said Government for the construction of the said project over Mexican territory, or to its actual cooperation in such construction.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house, December 7, 1934.

Mr. ASHURST also presented the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions:

STATE OF ARIZONA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
ELEVENTH LEGISLATURE,
THIRD SPECIAL SESSION.

House Memorial 1

To the President and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the house of representatives of the Eleventh Legislature of the State of Arizona, in third special session, respectfully represents:

Our Nation as a whole, and our people as individual units of the Nation, are suffering from and because of a general paralysis of business, industry, and trade. The normal flow of all branches of commerce is obstructed and many marts of trade partially or wholly suspended, thus preventing them from rendering their usual services to the public at large and to the people of the United States as individuals.

This stagnation in business, from whatever cause or causes originated, has and still is causing enormous loss, everywhere, equally to concentrated capital engaged in the basic industries of our country and also to the individual citizenry of our Nation, carrying with it on the crest of its foremost waves misery, suffering, and want, to those of limited means, who, because of this depression in industry and trade, are deprived of the privilege of earning their daily wage, in order that they might relieve the gnawing pangs of hunger or clothe the weakening body against the rigors of winter's chilling blasts.

These deplorable conditions are so wide-spread and universal in the extent to which they affect the citizenry of the Nation that it is breeding a dangerous discontent, fostering socialism, instilling the idea of communism, and is wholly destructive of the morale of a large and growing number of people to such extent as to give the gravest warning and apprehension for the safety of the general government.

It is clearly apparent that so long as the general populace of the Nation has no buying power, nor the opportunity to create a buying power, that any effort to stimulate either trade or industry must of necessity be sporadic in its nature and in the end a failure as has been repeatedly proven.

All efforts so far in the giving of relief have been either local in character or applied for the relief of certain classes of citizens or to stabilize or stimulate certain trades or industries, and that all like proposals made by financial and industrial leaders and by many Members of the Congress of the United States are of a like character and, as your memorialists fully believe, must in the end also fail to meet the Nation's needs.

Without decrying the potential local or class benefits to be derived from such measures so sponsored, we would call your attention to a measure of proposed legislation which we believe would meet the Nation's needs and give immediate relief to all who need. The proposed legislation to which reference is made is known as the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan, which is simple, self-executing, self-liquidating, and Nation-wide in its application. It does not contemplate any changes in the set-up of our Government or the establishment of any new departments. We represent the plan to be substantially as follows:

The payment to each citizen of the United States, both men and women, who have led clean, law-abiding lives and shall have attained the age of 60 years, the sum of $200 per month, under the express condition that the money so received shall be spent within the calendar month that it is received and for commodities only. No part of it may be expended for investments of any kind. That the recipient shall retire from a remunerative position.

In support of this constructive plan, we submit the following:

First. It is a primary duty of all civilized governments to provide its subjects and citizens with a flexible, liquid, rapid-moving medium of exchange, whose value must be kept fairly constant and whose flow through channels of trade and commerce must be constant and uninterrupted.

Second. That whenever basic industries unite or individuals combine to disturb the steady flow of this exchange medium or to unreasonably depress its value, it is the duty and a proper function of the National Government to place a restraining hand upon their activities so as to restore and preserve its exchange value.

Third. Available records indicate the following burdens now borne by citizens of the United States, to wit:

|---|---|
| In 28 States, cost and upkeep of poorhouses with 775,000 inmates | $2,500,000,000 |
| All forms of relief work | 36,000,000,000 |
| Cost of all forms of crime | 18,000,000,000 |
| Cost to labor by reason of lower wages and loss of time (1932) | 25,000,000,000 |

Loss by strikes (1927), 37,800,000 days.

Loss to trade and industry unknown but appalling.

1930 census gives 10,300,000 citizens who by reason of age would be entitled to this pension, with a probable 2,300,000 whose income is in excess of the $200 per month pension.

That with the retirement of 5,000,000 of the remaining 8,000,000 from gainful occupations, there would at once be created openings for approximately 5,000,000 men. That the regular expenditure of $200 per month throughout the year creates a new job; with 8,000,000 men expended regularly $200 per month, there would be 8,000,000 more new jobs created, which would absorb 13,000,000 of the 15,000,000 and thus practically reestablish normal employment. That this whole condition could be brought about in 90 days' time. That this reemployment of labor would greatly reduce the amount now being expended for relief. It would also reduce crime and would wipe out the entire loss to labor by reason of unemployment.

Fourth. That the aged persons of the country are quite evenly distributed, and that a regular payment to them of $200 under the proposed restrictions of the Townsend old-age revolving-pension plan places buying power in every community; that it distributes and redistributes an exchange medium throughout the length and breadth of the land, whose steady and regular flow cannot be interrupted by any economic condition, save a general public disaster, and whose exchange value can be maintained by governmental regulation, thus preventing its becoming frozen.

Wherefore, your memorialist prays that you examine carefully into all merits of the aforesaid Townsend old-age-pension plan and that you devote to it your most searching analysis of its merits, and if you find, as we believe you will, that this plan has to its credit all the merit that we claim for it, that your honorable body will at once enact it into law, to the end that industry and trade may be placed at normal, that labor may have a chance to earn its wage, that the general morale of the country may be restored, and want and suffering be driven from our land.

Wherefore, your memorialist further prays that the Congress make a direct appropriation for the initial sum necessary to meet the expense of the first payment, and that a sales tax upon commodities and commercial transactions be levied in such an amount and at a rate that will provide a fund to meet all future monthly payments, all funds derived from such a tax levy to be earmarked for that specific purpose.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house December 3, 1934.

House Memorial 7

To the Federal Bureau of Public Roads:

Your memorialist, the Eleventh Legislature of the State of Arizona, in third special session, respectfully represents:

That certain highway, locally known as the "Sunset route", which extends across Cochise County, Ariz., from Steins Pass, near the New Mexican boundary, through the towns of San Simon, Bowie, Willcox, Cochise, and Dragoon, to Benson, is one of the principally traveled thoroughfares in the State of Arizona.

Although this highway, over most of its length, is only a county highway and has not been permanently improved, the desirability of its location and its other natural advantages are such that a large part of its heavy traffic is represented by interstate tourists, who prefer it to better improved but less desirably located highways.

Wherefore your memorialist suggests the advisability of a thorough investigation by engineers of the Bureau of Public Roads of the advantages possessed by this route, with a view to determining its feasibility as a military highway and otherwise as a permanent Federal route across the eastern part of Arizona, and earnestly requests that such investigation be made at the earliest practicable time.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Adopted by house December 11, 1934.

Speaker of the House.
LALLAH RUTH,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. ASHURST also presented resolutions adopted by the State Land Board of the State of Arizona, at Phoenix, Ariz., which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, to enact legislation to grant to the State of Arizona four additional sections of land in each township, specifically for the further support and maintenance of the common schools in the State of Arizona, and further to urge upon the properly authorized agencies the suggestion that the Secretary of the Interior be requested to rescind or modify his order withdrawing potentially irrigable land of the Lower Gila Basin in the State of Arizona

Your memorialist, the State Land Department of the State of Arizona, in regular meeting duly convened, respectfully represents:

Whereas Arizona has a pure, dry, healing climate which has attracted, and continues to attract, large numbers of individuals suffering chronic disabilities and who come to this State because of the restorative qualities of the climate; and

Whereas this continued increment and influx of citizens, many of whom are physically incapacitated for making a living for their families or themselves by virtue of such chronic disabilities, and/or advanced old age, and/or who find such opportunities as might be suited to their conditions all too rare, places upon this State a constantly growing responsibility, necessitating increased relief expenditures, and adding to the already heavy burdens upon the humanitarian organizations and the people generally; and

Whereas Arizona is the youngest State in the Union, with its potential resources and taxable wealth as yet largely undeveloped, while its productive capacity is tremendously restricted by vast withdrawals of land for Indian reservations, national forest, and other Federal projects, circumstances which entitle the State to the utmost consideration, assistance, and cooperation of the Federal Government; and

Whereas the grants of land for various purposes made to the State of Arizona under the terms of the Enabling Act, and particularly the grant of four sections in each township for the benefit of the public schools, have by no means effected the full measure of their purpose for reasons beyond the State's control; and

Whereas among the causes for this unsatisfactory result may be mentioned the average low value of the granted lands, owing to the withdrawal of all timber land and of the major part of agricultural land within the State; the burdensome restriction, later rescinded, disallowing school sections having mineral in place; and the inability of the State, by reason of insufficient base, to properly block out and thus render of highest economic value the range lands owned by the State; and

Whereas during the year 1929 the Federal Government withdrew from all forms of entry, which includes selection by the State, the land embraced within the area known as the "Lower Gila Basin", thereby denying to the State the ownership of any share of this now largely undeveloped but potentially irrigable area; and

Whereas in view of these facts and conditions it is felt that in justice and equity, in some measure to compensate the State for the handicaps under which it has been forced to labor and to assist it in carrying the burden referred to in the second and third paragraphs above, there should be an additional grant of land to Arizona: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the State Land Department of the State of Arizona request and urge that the Congress of the United States enact any legislation which may be necessary to effect to Arizona an additional grant of four sections out of each township in the State specifically for the support and maintenance of the common school system of the State, and incidentally to measurably compensate the State for the great losses in taxable wealth it has sustained through vast Federal withdrawals, as well as to enable it to round out and make valuable its range holdings; and

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to rescind or modify his order withdrawing the potentially irrigable land of the Lower Gila Basin in order that the State may select a proper and proportionate share thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, and to Arizona's representatives in Congress, Senator HENRY F. ASHURST, Hon. CARL HAYDEN, and Hon. ISABELLA GREENWAY, with the request that they exert their utmost endeavor and influence to effectuate its objects.

JAMES H. KERBY, Secretary of State,
ARTHUR T. LA PRADE, Attorney General,
W. M. COX, State Treasurer,
ANA FROHMILLER, State Auditor.

I, Howard J. Smith, State land commissioner of the State of Arizona, do hereby certify that the above is a true and complete copy of the resolution passed at the meeting of the State Land Board, held on the 5th day of October 1934, as shown by the records on file in the office of the State Land Department.

Done at the capitol, Phoenix, Ariz., this 10th day of December 1934.

[SEAL] HOWARD J. SMITH,
State Land Commissioner, State of Arizona.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by Local No. 259 of the International Association of Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refinery Workers of America, of Arkansas City, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation to establish a minimum wage scale of $5 per day for common labor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Chambers of Commerce of Ellsworth, Salina, Junction City, and Abilene, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the enactment of legislation placing all classes of public carriers under the control and supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Chambers of Commerce of Ellsworth and Abilene, in the State of Kansas, favoring the repeal of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, known as the "long- and short-haul clause", which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from T. A. Fry, receiver of the Wichita Northwestern Railway Co., Hutchinson, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation, first, to place all commercial transportation on the highways under the same measure of regulation that is applied to railroads, so far as the nature of that transportation justifies; second, to regulate the rates, service, and practices of carriers by water operating between points in the United States in interstate commerce; third, to amend paragraphs (3) and (4) of section 15 of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish through routes and joint rates found by the Commission to be necessary or desirable in the public interest; and, fourth, to restore the long- and short-haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Act to its original form, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief resolution from 147 women's organizations of Kansas, asking that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations take early action on the World Court protocols. I ask also that the names of these organizations be printed and that the resolutions themselves be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution follows:

Whereas opinion in our organization has never faltered in its devotion to the campaign to make the United States a member of the World Court:

Resolved, That we urge that the World Court protocols be voted out of committee and laid before the United States Senate for immediate action.

Mr. President, I wish to add that the women's organizations represented here are from practically every county in Kansas, and that they represent almost every class and every religious creed. Included are scores of local Woman's Christian Temperance Union organizations, the State Federation of Women's Clubs, business and professional women's clubs, religious organizations, study clubs, and various others.

I hope we may get early action as prayed for in these resolutions. I send the resolutions to the desk for notation in the RECORD and appropriate reference.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The names of the various organizations, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols are as follows:

COMPETITIVE CIVIL SERVICE IN THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG introduced a bill (S. 320) placing the position of postmaster in first-, second-, and third-class offices in the competitive classified service and for other purposes essential to the establishment of the Post Office Department on a nonpolitical career basis, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, or of any other class hereafter established, shall hereafter be appointed, without term, by the Postmaster General in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 430): Provided, That postmasters now serving may continue to serve until the end of their terms.

SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make appointments of postmasters by promotion of persons within the Postal Service possessing such qualifications of age, education, residence, and experience in the Postal Service as may be required by the Postmaster General with the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 3. If no persons are able to qualify for appointment by promotion or transfer under the provisions of section 2, the Postmaster General shall request the Civil Service Commission to hold an open competitive examination under the provisions of the Civil Service Act and rules.

SEC. 4. That all appointments of acting postmasters at offices of the first, second, third, or fourth class shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service rule governing temporary appointments.

SEC. 5. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to abolish the position of assistant postmaster at each post office where such position exists, at any time he finds, after investigation, that the efficient operation of such office will not be impaired thereby. Such investigations shall be made as soon as practicable, and from time to time thereafter. This section shall not be construed to prohibit the creation of the position of assistant postmaster at any post office where such position has been abolished, or at any other post office, if, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the services of an assistant postmaster becomes necessary to the efficient operation of such office. The Postmaster General shall include in his annual report an account of the action taken pursuant to this section.

SEC. 6. That the positions of First Assistant Postmaster General, Second Assistant Postmaster General, Third Assistant Postmaster General, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, Purchasing Agent, and Comptroller in the Post Office Department are hereby placed in the competitive classified service and made subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act and rules and the priorities defined hereafter. Appointments to the positions of First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters General shall be made by promotion or transfer of qualified persons within the classified service, including first-class postmasters.

SEC. 7. It shall be unlawful for the Postmaster General during his incumbency to be an officer or member of any political committee or to engage, directly or indirectly, in any political activity of any nature.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Mr. WHEELER introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally

Whereas the decline in agricultural income and the unsatisfactory condition of agriculture and of those engaged therein is a matter of increasing concern to the Congress, and affects the general welfare of the Nation and its citizens; and

Whereas in recent years the agricultural income has decreased while the earnings and profits of concerns processing or dealing in certain lines of farm products have increased or declined only moderately; and

Whereas there has developed an increasingly large proportionate spread between the prices received by the farmer for his products and the prices paid therefor by the consumer; and

Whereas, according to the latest statistics of income published by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, 22 large corporations reported making over 45 percent of the gross sales of all corporations engaged in the processing and manufacture of food products in 1931, and 102 large corporations reported making 60 percent of the gross sales of such corporations; and

Whereas it is charged that monopolistic, oppressive, and unfair methods and practices of various middlemen, warehousemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, and handlers are in whole or in part responsible for the conditions above described, and that wasteful and uneconomic methods have contributed toward bringing about these conditions; and

Whereas it is charged that said various middlemen, warehousemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, handlers, and others have violated the various antitrust laws of the United States, that they have burdened, restricted, and restrained interstate and foreign commerce and adversely affected the volume and price of farm products moving in intrastate and foreign commerce; and

Whereas it is charged that many lines of processing, warehousing, and/or dealing in farm products are so dominated by a handful of large concerns as to impede the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce to the detriment of both the farmer and the consumer; and

Whereas it is charged that through the payment of high and excessive salaries and other devices said middlemen, warehousemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, and others escape just taxation by the United States, that said salaries tend unduly to diminish the tax revenues of the United States and tend to burden and restrain interstate and foreign commerce in farm products, and to divert and conceal the earnings and profits of the concerns paying said salaries, and that by various devices those receiving said salaries escape their just share of Federal taxation; and

Whereas it is believed that the Congress should consider whether new legislation should be enacted or existing legislation amended on any of the subjects hereinbefore described and in aid thereof should be informed on all of said subjects: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report, at the next session of Congress—

First. (1) The extent of the decline in agricultural income in recent years, including the amount and percentage of such decline;

(2) The extent of the increases or decreases in recent years in the income of the principal corporations and other manufacturers, warehousemen, and/or processors of the principal farm products, as compared with the decline in agricultural income, including the amount and percentage of such changes; and

(3) The proportion of total consumer cost of representative products manufactured or processed from the principal farm products which is represented by the proceeds received by (a) the farmer, (b) the manufacturers, processors, and warehousemen, and (c) the distributors of such principal farm products and such representative products manufactured therefrom.

Second. The financial position of the principal corporations engaged in the manufacturing, processing, warehousing, distribution, and marketing of the representative major products manufactured from such principal farm products, including—

(1) The capitalization and assets of such corporations and the means and sources of the growth of such capitalization and assets;

(2) The investment, costs, profits, and rates of return of such corporations;

(3) The salaries of the officers of such companies; and

(4) The extent to which said corporations avoid income taxes, if at all, and the extent to which officers receiving such salaries paid income taxes thereon.

Third. The extent of concentration of control and of monopoly in the manufacturing, processing, warehousing, distribution, and marketing of representative major farm products which is maintained or has been obtained by any corporation or other organization, including—

(1) Methods and devices used by such corporations for obtaining and maintaining their control or monopoly of the manufacturing, marketing, processing, warehousing, and distribution of such commodities, and the proportion of any such major farm commodity handled by each of the large units involved; and

(2) The extent to which fraudulent, dishonest, unfair, and injurious methods are employed in the grading, warehousing, and transportation of such farm products, including combinations, monopolies, price fixing, and manipulation of prices on the commodity exchanges.

Fourth. The extent to which the cooperative agencies have entered into the processing, warehousing, and marketing of representative major farm products and the general effects of such cooperative agencies upon the producer and consumer.

Fifth. The extent to which other countries have adopted or promoted processing, warehousing, and marketing agencies of a public, quasi-public, or cooperative sort for the simplification and cheapening of the processing, warehousing, and marketing of agricultural products, and other administrative agencies which may have been set up for the protection of the farmer-producer and the consumer.

Sixth. Any conclusions and/or recommendations with regard to increasing the income of farm producers or other recommendations with regard to the improvement of the economic position of farmers or consumers growing out of the inquiry.

SEC. 2. The Department of Agriculture, the National Recovery Administration, the Department of Justice, and other agencies of the Government are directed to cooperate with the Commission in such inquiry to the fullest extent possible.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution the Federal Trade Commission shall have the same right to obtain data and to inspect income-tax returns as the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and to submit any relevant or useful information thus obtained to the Congress or to either House thereof.

SEC. 4. For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the Federal Trade Commission, the Attorney General, and the courts of the United States shall have and may exercise all of the powers and jurisdiction severally conferred upon them by the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes", approved September 28, 1914.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, which shall be available for expenditure as the Federal Trade Commission may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries, in carrying out this resolution and prosecuting litigation necessary in aid of the powers conferred hereunder.

SEC. 6. The Federal Trade Commission is directed to present an interim report to the Congress on January 1, 1936, describing the progress made and the status of its work hereunder, and a final report with recommendations for legislation not later than July 1, 1936.

TAXATION OF TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that all income and interest from all bonds or other certificates of indebtedness hereafter issued by the Government of the United States shall be taxable by the United States.

ELIZABETH TENNER

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 16), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1934, to Elizabeth Tenner, mother of Zelda Tenner, late an assistant clerk in the office of Senator BANKHEAD, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

MONOPOLISTIC INFLUENCE UPON INDUSTRIAL PRICES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer a resolution asking for information. I think it will lead to no discussion whatever.

The resolution (S. Res. 17) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby requested to send to the Senate as soon as practicable a certain study, memorandum, or report, prepared by Gardner C. Means, economic adviser on finance, relative to monopolistic influence upon, or monopolistic control of, industrial prices, and any and all reports or memorandums said Gardner C. Means has made touching the subject of industrial prices.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the Senator asking for present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I desire to have it considered now.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution calls for information which would seem to be of interest and importance to the Senate. I know of no objection to its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

PROCEDURE IN IMPEACHMENT TRIALS

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 18), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of 12 Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.

ELIZA J. SELLERS

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 19), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1934, to Eliza J. Sellers, widow of James F. Sellers, late messenger at the card door of the Senate, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. GLASS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 20), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 25), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is authorized to employ until July 1, 1935, an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

BLANCHE A. HALL

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 26), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1934, to Blanche A. Hall, daughter of William L. Walling, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS

Mr. WAGNER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 27), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

SYSTEM OF HEALTH INSURANCE

Mr. BLACK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 28), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate is hereby directed and instructed, either acting through the full committee or through a duly appointed subcommittee, as soon as practicable, to make a full and complete investigation in order to determine the best and most effective kind of Federal legislation to provide a system of health insurance throughout the entire United States, and to report to the Senate as early as practicable the recommendations outlining the kind of legislation it is believed will most effectively accomplish this purpose.

AMENDMENT OF RULE XXV—COMMITTEE ON AERONAUTICS AND AVIATION

Mr. McCARRAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 29), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, on page 80, after the third line of paragraph 1, the following:

"Committee on Aeronautics and Aviation, to consist of 12 Senators."

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—RIVER AND HARBOR ITEMS

Mr. VANDENBERG submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 30), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they are hereby, amended by adding, after rule XX, a new rule, relating to river and harbor projects, as follows:

"Rule XXI. When a rivers and harbors authorization bill is pending, a point of order may be made against the authorization of any project in any form not formally recommended to the Congress in an official report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors."

COLUMBIA AND SNAKE RIVERS, OREG., WASH., AND IDAHO

Mr. McNARY and Mr. STEIWER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 31), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the Rivers and Harbors Act, approved June 13, 1902, be, and is hereby, requested to review the reports on the Columbia and Snake Rivers, Oreg., Wash., and Idaho, submitted in House Document No. 16, Seventy-third Congress, second session, with a view to determining the advisability of constructing a dam and navigation locks at Umatilla Rapids in connection with the improvement of Snake River.

JAPANESE POLICY IN MANCHURIA

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 32), which was submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas by the Kellogg Peace Pact signed at Paris on August 27, 1928, the high contracting parties (including the United States and Japan) solemnly declared that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies; and

Whereas by the nine-power treaty signed at Washington on February 6, 1922, the contracting powers (including the United States and Japan) agreed to respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China, and to refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly states; and

Whereas it is alleged that the policy pursued by Japan in Manchuria in establishing the Manchukuoan Government, in setting up a government oil monopoly of foreign oil interests, and the refusal by Manchukuo, as stated in the Japanese press, to observe the open-door policy except as to nations according her recognition, is a violation of the above treaties: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the policy pursued by Japan in Manchuria with a view to determining whether such policy has violated any of the provisions of the Kellogg peace pact or the nine-power treaty.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $ , shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

FORTIFICATION OF CERTAIN MANDATED ISLANDS IN THE PACIFIC

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 33), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas by article 119 of the treaty of peace with Germany, signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights over her overseas possessions, including the groups of islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator; and

Whereas the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, including the United States, agreed that in accordance with article 22, part I (Covenant of the League of Nations), of the said treaty, a mandate should be conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to administer the said islands; and

Whereas His Majesty the Emperor of Japan accepted such mandate, subject to the agreement, among others, that no military or naval bases should be established or fortifications erected in the mandated territory; and

Whereas for some 14 years there have been recurrent charges in the press to the effect that Japan has fortified her mandated islands in violation of the agreement not to do so; and

Whereas it is alleged that Japan has failed to make reports on its administration of its mandated islands, as required by the League of Nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the charge that Japan is fortifying or has fortified her mandated islands and to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $ , shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 34), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES AND THE ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 35), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas to prevent monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade and efforts to obtain monopolistic control of trade and commerce, laws were enacted by the Congress which are still in force; and

Whereas it is claimed that such laws have not been enforced and that monopolies have increased and monopolistic control of industry has been strengthened; and

Whereas notwithstanding the enactment of said antitrust laws it is alleged that the National Industrial Recovery Act has been construed as permitting monopolies and pro tanto repeals the said antitrust laws; and

Whereas it is alleged that the said antitrust laws are inadequate to meet monopolistic developments and should therefore be strengthened in order that the purpose for which they were enacted might be realized: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to conduct an investigation to determine (1) whether the National Industrial Recovery Act has encouraged or promoted monopolistic practices; (2) whether the National Industrial Recovery Act or rules, regulations, and codes issued under it have tended to nullify the antitrust laws; (3) whether, in that event, legislation is needed to restore the antitrust laws to the position which they occupied prior to the date of enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act; and (4) whether the antitrust laws, if properly enforced, are adequate to control monopolistic practices.

The committee shall report as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses until the final report is submitted; to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF REPORT ON STOCK EXCHANGE PRACTICES

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 36), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 4,000 additional copies of the report (No. 1455) of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Seventy-third Congress, second session, on Stock Exchange Practices, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 364) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 396. An act to amend section 1180 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia with respect to usury (Rept. No. 2);

S. 397. An act to provide for recording of deeds of trust and mortgages secured on real estate in the District of Columbia, and for the releasing thereof, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 3);

S. 398. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto (Rept. No. 4);

S. 399. An act to amend sections 416 and 417 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 5);

S. 400. An act to permit the stepchildren of certain officers and employees of the United States to be admitted to the public schools of the District of Columbia without payment of tuition (Rept. No. 6);

S. 401. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia", approved February 27, 1929 (Rept. No. 7);

S. 402. An act to amend section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 8); and

S. 404. An act to provide for the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia in excess of that required for public projects and improvements, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 9).

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 408) to promote safety on the public highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia; to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 10) thereon.

REFERENCE OF NOMINATIONS OR TREATIES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the entry of the order which I send to the desk. I may state to the Senate that it is in identical form with orders entered at the last session and preceding sessions of the Senate, and is for the convenience of the Senate.

There being no objection, the order was read and entered, as follows:

Ordered, That on calendar days of the present session of the Congress when no executive session is held, nominations or treaties received from the President of the United States may, where no objection is interposed, be referred, as in executive session, to the appropriate committees by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

THE BUDGET

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

BUDGET MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Congress of the United States:

The Budget of the United States Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, of which this message is definitely a part, is transmitted herewith for your consideration. It deals principally with the moneys carried in the general and special accounts of the Government, which constitute the great bulk of the general fund, as this fund is shown on the first page of the daily Treasury statement. The remainder of the general fund consists mainly of moneys carried in trust accounts, which are not strictly Government moneys, and therefore enter only incidentally into the financial picture presented by the General Budget Summary.

REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1934

The total expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934, as shown in the General Budget Summary and supporting schedules, amounted to $7,105,000,000 in round figures. Of this amount, the sum of $1,086,000,000 was spent for the operation and maintenance of the regular departments and establishments of the Government, $556,000,000 to meet veterans' pensions and benefits, $757,000,000 for interest on the national debt, $360,000,000 for statutory debt retirements, and $63,000,000 for tax refunds, making in the aggregate $2,822,000,000. The remainder of the total expenditures for that year, amounting to $4,283,000,000, was spent for recovery and relief. The general purposes to which this amount was applied are set forth in detail in supporting schedule no. 3. It will be seen that this amount was expended approximately as follows:

| | In millions of dollars |
|---|---|
| Agricultural aid | 847.0 |
| Relief | 1,844.4 |
| Public works | 653.5 |
| Aid to home owners | 194.9 |
| Reconstruction Finance Corporation | 584.6 |
| Miscellaneous | 158.6 |
| Total | 4,283.0 |

A part of this expenditure of $4,283,000,000 for recovery and relief is repayable; indeed, substantial repayments have already been made to the Government. Loans amounted to $732,000,000, and subscriptions to capital stock and preferred shares to $826,000,000, making a total of $1,558,000,000 which may be regarded as repayable expenditures made during the fiscal year 1934. The part regarded as nonrepayable totals $2,725,000,000. This sum has been spent mainly for grants, aids, public-works projects, and administrative expenses.

The total receipts of the Government for the fiscal year 1934 reached in the aggregate $3,115,500,000. Of this amount $2,640,600,000 came from internal revenue, $313,400,000 from customs, $152,600,000 from miscellaneous revenues, and $8,900,000 from receipts due to the realization upon assets. Income tax supplied $818,000,000 of internal revenues; miscellaneous taxes (e. g., estate, capital stock, liquor, tobacco, stamp, and excise taxes), $1,469,600,000, and processing taxes, $353,000,000. Since the processing taxes are appropriated for the use of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, their total should be subtracted from the aggregate receipts shown above in order to arrive at the general receipts of the Government.

The general receipts of $2,762,500,000, excluding processing taxes, approximately equaled the regular expenditures for the year, a fact which should be duly recognized.

The deficit at the end of the fiscal year 1934, as shown in the General Budget Summary, was $3,989,500,000 in round figures. After deducting $359,900,000 for statutory debt retirements during 1934, the resulting net deficit financed from borrowings was $3,629,600,000. The gross increase in the national debt amounted to $4,514,400,000, making a total debt of $27,053,000,000, as indicated in supporting schedule no. 6. This addition to the debt during 1934 included the financing of the net deficit of $3,629,600,000 and an increase of $884,800,000 in the cash balance of the general and special accounts, as shown in supporting schedule no. 4.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Because of its profound influence on the Federal Budget, the economic situation may be briefly summarized at this point. Business was substantially more active during the fiscal year 1934 than in either of the 2 preceding fiscal years. At the opening of the year, in July 1933, producers were increasing their operations, sharply reflecting in part larger orders placed in anticipation of code regulations. There was a temporary decline in output in the autumn and early winter, in response to an overaccumulation of inventories during this period, but production again advanced during the last half of the fiscal year. Industrial output for the period as a whole, when measured by the Federal Reserve Board index, was 25 percent greater than in the fiscal year 1933 and only slightly below the level of the fiscal year 1931. The degree of recovery varied in the different industries. Production of nondurable goods, which had declined only moderately during the depression, approached within 1 percent of its 1923–25 average, while output in the durable-goods group, where prices showed relatively small declines since 1929, was 38 percent below its average in those years. Construction activity financed by private individuals continued to be restricted in amount, although public construction increased. This result was in no way surprising, in view of the enormous sums spent on permanent structures, in many cases in excess of actual requirements, during the period 1925–29.

The average volume of industrial employment expanded in proportion to production, and the total number of unemployed at the end of the fiscal year 1934, although still very large, decreased by about two millions as compared with June 1933, and four millions as compared with the worst point of the depression, which fell in March 1933. Reflecting higher wage rates and an expansion in total hours worked, industrial pay rolls averaged sharply higher over the year. Distribution of commodities at retail to consumers increased, but in smaller proportion than output, with the result that inventories of manufactured goods showed a net growth over the year ended June 30, 1934.

At the end of the fiscal year 1934 the Bureau of Labor Statistics index of wholesale commodity prices stood at 74.8 percent of its 1926 average as compared with 66.3 percent on June 30, 1933, and 59.6 percent early in March 1933. The sharpest rise in prices took place in farm products which were affected by anticipation of smaller crops during the summer of 1934. The rise in agricultural prices more than offset the decrease in farm output, and farmers' cash income, including governmental rental and benefit payments, was 34 percent higher than in the fiscal year 1933. Corporate profits, aided by larger volume as well as by inventory appreciation, also increased considerably.

Following the close of the fiscal year 1934, output in basic industries fell sharply through September, reflecting particularly an overaccumulation of inventories in steel and textile products and the delay in the placing of orders for autumn merchandise because of uncertainty as to the effect of the drought. Industrial prices, however, remained relatively stable and prices of farm products and foods moved into closer alignment with prices of nonagricultural commodities. In retail markets, goods continued to move in sustained volume with the result that inventories were reduced to lower levels and output was again increasing in the final quarter of the calendar year 1934.

CONDITION OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1935

The total expenditure requirements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, are estimated at approximately $8,581,000,000, as shown in the general Budget summary. Of this amount, the sum of $3,321,000,000 is for regular expenditures, and $5,260,000,000 for recovery and relief. The regular expenditures are for the following general purposes:

| | In millions of dollars |
|---|---|
| Operation and maintenance of the regular departments and establishments | 1,235 |
| Veterans' pensions and benefits | 610 |
| Interest on the national debt | 835 |
| Tax refunds (excluding processing taxes) | 68 |
| Subtotal | 2,748 |
| Debt retirements | 573 |
| Total | 3,321 |

The amount of $1,235,000,000, mentioned above, includes $20,000,000 for expenditures estimated to be made this year from an additional sum of approximately $125,000,000 which will be required for 1935 to make up deficiencies in the appropriations for the regular departments and establishments, including the Veterans' Administration. Of this additional sum, approximately $65,000,000 will be required to meet the needs of the Veterans' Administration due to the application of new laws or revised rules pertaining to service-connected disabilities.

Of the total expenditures for recovery and relief, $788,000,000 are for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the refunding of processing taxes, while $4,472,000,000 are devoted to other purposes in the recovery and relief program. During the first 5 months of the current fiscal year the Government expended for recovery and relief $1,712,000,000, or at the rate of about $350,000,000 per month.

A summary of the aggregate amounts expended for recovery and relief from February 1, 1932, to November 30, 1934, shows a total figure of $8,164,900,000. This expenditure has been distributed approximately as follows:

| | In millions of dollars |
|---|---|
| Agricultural aid | 1,337.3 |
| Relief | 2,783.0 |
| Public works | 1,226.2 |
| Aid to home owners | 306.3 |
| Reconstruction Finance Corporation | 2,351.2 |
| Miscellaneous | 160.9 |
| Total | 8,164.9 |

From February 1, 1932, to November 30, 1934, nearly 3 years, provision for recovery and relief through appropriations and authorizations reached a grand total of $14,412,400,000. Of this total there remained unexpended on November 30, $6,247,500,000, a large part of which had already been obligated though not yet actually paid out by the Treasury. The sum of approximately $900,000,000 from the unobligated portion must, however, be made available for transfer to emergency relief needs during the remaining months of the current fiscal year. Recommendation is therefore made that the Congress provide for the immediate transfer of such unobligated portion for relief during the transition period from direct relief to work relief as outlined in my annual message.

Appropriations for emergency relief purposes will be completely exhausted early in February. Hence it is vitally necessary that unobligated balances of moneys already appropriated be made immediately available to care for the unemployed during the remainder of the fiscal year 1935 and the transition period. Through such action no new appropriation will be required to carry our relief needs for the current fiscal year.

The total receipts for the fiscal year 1935 are estimated at $3,711,000,000. After deducting from this amount the processing taxes, estimated at $589,000,000, there remains $3,122,000,000 to be applied against other expenditures of the Government.

The income tax for 1935 is estimated to yield $234,000,000 more than in 1934, or a total of $1,051,000,000. The receipts from miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes, exclusive of processing taxes, are expected to produce $60,000,000 more in 1935 than in 1934, thus bringing the total yield up to $1,543,000,000. It is estimated that customs will show a decrease for 1935 under 1934 of about $26,000,000, due to the Cuban sugar agreement and to the foreign-trade situation in general. Miscellaneous revenues and other receipts from the realization of certain assets are expected to yield for 1935 about $227,000,000, an increase of $66,000,000 over 1934.

The deficit for the fiscal year 1935 is estimated at $4,869,000,000, including $573,000,000 for statutory debt retirements. On December 26, 1934, the gross national debt stood at $28,484,000,000. It is estimated that the gross debt on June 30, 1935, will amount to about $31,000,000,000. In the Budget message of last year it was estimated that the national debt on June 30, 1935, would amount to $31,800,000,000. According to the latest estimates the debt will not reach this amount by $800,000,000.

THE FISCAL YEAR 1936

In the Budget message of last year I said, speaking of the fiscal year 1936, that we should plan to have a definitely balanced Budget for the third year of recovery and from that time on to seek a continued reduction of the national debt.

Despite the substantial measure of recovery achieved since that statement was made, unemployment is still large. The States and local units now provide a smaller proportionate share of relief than a year ago and the Federal Government is therefore called upon to continue to aid in this necessary work.

For this reason it is evident that we have not yet reached a point at which a complete balance of the Budget can be obtained. I am, however, submitting to the Congress a Budget for the fiscal year 1936 which balances except for expenditures to give work to the unemployed. If this Budget receives the approval of the Congress, the country will henceforth have the assurance that, with the single exception of this item, every current expenditure of whatever nature will be fully covered by our estimates of current receipts. Such deficit as occurs will be due solely to this cause, and it may be expected to decline as rapidly as private industry is able to reemploy those who now are without work.

A résumé of the financial plan which the general Budget summary shows for 1936, as compared with 1934 and 1935, is presented below:

[In millions of dollars]

| | 1934 | 1935 | 1936 |
|---|---|---|---|
| I. Regular: | | | |
| 1. Receipts | 2,763 | 3,123 | 3,422 |
| 2. Expenditures: | | | |
| (1) Operation and maintenance of regular departments and establishments | 1,086 | 1,235 | 1,622 |
| (2) Veterans' pensions and benefits | 556 | 610 | 740 |
| (3) Interest on national debt | 757 | 835 | 875 |
| (4) Tax refunds (exclusive of processing taxes) | 63 | 68 | 65 |
| Total regular expenditures | 2,462 | 2,748 | 3,302 |
| II. Recovery and relief: | | | |
| 1. Agricultural Adjustment Administration: | | | |
| Processing taxes | 353 | 589 | 570 |
| Expenditures (including refunds of processing taxes) | 290 | 788 | 472 |
| Excess of expenditures over taxes | −63 | +199 | −98 |
| 2. Other recovery and relief expenditures | 3,993 | 4,472 | 4,110 |
| Total recovery and relief expenditures | 3,930 | 4,671 | 4,012 |
| Total expenditures (exclusive of debt retirements) | 6,392 | 7,419 | 7,314 |
| Net deficit | 3,629 | 4,296 | 3,892 |
| Debt retirements | 360 | 573 | 636 |
| Gross deficit | 3,989 | 4,869 | 4,528 |

The estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1936, as shown in the general Budget summary, total in round figures $8,520,000,000, including statutory debt requirements. Of this amount, $3,938,000,000 are for regular purposes, and the remainder for recovery and relief. The regular expenditures consist of $1,622,000,000 for the operation and maintenance of the regular departments and establishments of the Government, which includes $200,000,000 to be expended from an annual appropriation of $300,000,000 for public works, as requested in the Budget and as explained below. The other items of regular expenditures are $740,000,000 for veterans' pensions and benefits, $875,000,000 for interest on the national debt, $636,000,000 for statutory debt retirements, and $65,000,000 for tax refunds (excluding processing-tax refunds).

Some of the principal increases in the major expenditure items for 1936 may be cited. The restoration of the final 5 percent of the 15-percent salary reduction amounts to about $40,000,000 for the regular departments and establishments, exclusive of the Postal Service. The latter service requires an additional sum of $25,000,000 for this purpose. Provision has been made in 1936 for an increase in the civil-service retirement and disability fund of $20,000,000 over 1935, making a total annual contribution to this fund of $40,000,000. This increase will enable the Government to meet more nearly its annual obligation with respect to this fund. It has been estimated that this obligation amounts to $52,000,000, but such estimate has not been sufficiently established to justify its inclusion in the Budget. An effort will be made during the coming year, however, definitely to establish the Government's annual liability, the amount of which will be included in the 1937 Budget. Likewise, an increase of $50,000,000 is recommended in the veterans' adjusted-service-certificate fund, thus bringing the total annual contribution to this fund up to $100,000,000. The actuarial requirement of the fund for 1936 has been estimated at $155,000,000. An effort will also be made during the coming year to establish this fund on a more definite basis consistent with the Government's actual liability under existing law. The expenditures for national defense have been increased for 1936 over 1935 by $180,000,000. This increase is due to the current policy of the Congress and the Executive to make up for the delay by the United States in meeting the provisions of the naval treaties of 1922 and 1930, and to provide replacement and improved equipment for the Army. Veterans' pensions and other requirements have also been increased by about $130,000,000, after adding to the 1935 figure the estimated supplemental amount previously mentioned, which is due to the application of new laws and revised rules pertaining to service-connected disabilities.

Another increase in the estimated expenditures is $200,000,000 from an appropriation of $300,000,000 which I am requesting for public works. This appropriation is intended to take care of the normal public-works requirements of the Government usually included in the annual supply bills, such as Federal highways, river and harbor improvements, and general public works, including the construction program of the Tennessee Valley Authority. This requested appropriation may therefore be regarded as regular instead of emergency. The debt charges for interest and retirements have increased considerably due to the growth of the national debt, but the decrease in the average annual interest rate has served to keep these charges down.

The estimated expenditures for recovery and relief during 1936 are placed at $4,110,000,000, excluding $472,000,000 for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. I recommend that $4,000,000,000 be appropriated by the Congress in one sum, subject to allocation by the Executive principally for giving work to those unemployed on the relief rolls. An estimate of expenditures covering this amount is included in the Budget.

The total receipts for the fiscal year 1936 are estimated at approximately $3,992,000,000. When $570,000,000 of estimated processing taxes are deducted from this amount, there will remain for general purposes $3,422,000,000.

The detailed estimates of revenues and receipts for 1936, shown in statement no. 1, indicate a gain of $137,000,000 in the collections from income tax over those for 1935. This gain is due to anticipated improvement in business and to the upward revision of rates in the Revenue Act of 1934. The miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes for 1936 are estimated to increase some $143,000,000 over the collections for 1935. This increase is predicated on the assumption that the taxes terminating on June 30 and July 31, 1935, will be extended by the Congress, and also that the tax rates which would be reduced on June 30, 1935, will be continued. Otherwise there will be a reduction in the total estimate of miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes of $378,000,000, thus bringing the total estimate down to $1,308,000,000, excluding processing taxes. Customs are estimated to yield $298,000,000 for 1936, representing a small increase of $11,000,000 over 1935. Miscellaneous revenues and other receipts are estimated to produce $250,000,000, a gain of about $23,000,000 over 1935.

While I do not consider it advisable at this time to propose any new or additional taxes for the fiscal year 1936, I do recommend that the Congress take steps by suitable legislation to extend the miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes which under existing law will expire next June or July, and also to maintain the current rates of these taxes which will be reduced next June. I consider that such taxes are necessary to the financing of the Budget for 1936.

In this connection, may I say, too, that the postal revenues, as estimated in detail in the annexed budget of the Post Office Department, are based on the continuation of the 3-cent postage rate for nonlocal first-class mail. Unless this rate is continued, the postal expenses for 1936, which include steamship and aircraft subsidies and free carriage of Government mail, will be increased by about $75,000,000, all of which will become an added burden on the general revenues of the Treasury. I, therefore, recommend the extension of the 3-cent rate.

If the estimates submitted in this Budget are approved, and if the expenditures for which authorization is asked are made in full, the deficit, including statutory debt retirements, will amount to $4,528,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936. The national debt will be increased during this year by approximately $3,152,000,000, thus bringing the total debt up to $34,239,000,000. But this increase, as I have pointed out, will be due solely to continued relief of unemployment.

CONTINUATION OF EMERGENCY AGENCIES

A number of the emergency agencies now authorized by law will terminate during the present fiscal year. Most of these agencies fill important present needs and should be continued. As rapidly as seems practicable, I am bringing the administrative expenses of these agencies under the supervision of the Director of the Budget.

ECONOMY LEGISLATION

Many of the estimates of appropriations contained in the Budget are based upon the continuation of certain legislative provisions with reference to economy which are now in force. They are appended hereto and should be reenacted if the estimates are to be sustained. Among those continued is the provision for certain special salary reductions, the suspension of the reenlistment bonus to men of the military and naval services, the reduction in travel allowances of certain postal employees, permitting temporary reassignment of duties of certain postal employees, reduction in fees of jurors and witnesses, permitting transfers between appropriations, and the involuntary retirement of Federal employees having 30 years' service. Specific provision is also made for service credits to certain personnel affected by the suspension of increases in pay during the fiscal years 1933 to 1935, in the determination of compensation accruing subsequent to June 30, 1935, but without authorizing the payment of the amount that would have been paid during these years. Among the economy provisions which now obtain and which it is not proposed to continue is the 5-percent reduction in compensation of Government employees after July 1, 1935. I see no reason, however, for the restoration of this reduction prior to that date. The index figure of the cost of living, on the basis of which salary restorations are provided by section 3, title II, of the Economy Act of 1933, now indicates that such restorations in all probability would not even be justified on next July 1, or for some time thereafter.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE FORM OF THE BUDGET

Several important changes have been made in the form of the Budget document for 1936. The purpose of these changes has been twofold: (1) To improve the usefulness of the document from the citizens' standpoint, and (2) to provide more adequate treatment of the financial requirements of certain governmental units, such as the Post Office Department and the District of Columbia.

The General Budget Summary, following this message, is designed to present on one page a comprehensive picture of the financial requirements of the Government. It exhibits the anticipated receipts from all sources and the estimated expenditures for all purposes. It also shows the deficit and indicates the proposed means of financing this deficit. Since the figures presented in the summary are necessarily in aggregate amounts, the details of these amounts are shown in six supporting schedules. Both in the summary and in these schedules appropriate columns are carried to provide direct comparisons between the Budget figures for 1936 and the estimated and actual figures for 1935 and 1934.

The revenue estimates are emphasized in this Budget for the first time. These estimates are set forth in Statement No. 1 in sufficient detail to show all the principal sources from which the Government gets its income. Accompanying this statement is a supporting text, which analyzes and gives the reasons for the 1936 estimates and compares them with those for 1935 and with the actual collections for 1934.

Annexed budgets are set up for the major self-supporting or self-contained units of the Government, namely, the Post Office Department, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the District of Columbia. The use of such budgets permits the receipts and expenditures of each of these units to be clearly and completely presented in gross figures and in balanced form, as has not hitherto been done. By following this method the net figures for each unit, which may be either appropriation needs or surplus receipts, are calculated and then carried to the General Budget Summary. Thus the financial requirements of these units are definitely tied into the general budgetary plan. The annexed budgets are therefore not in any sense independent or multiple budgets, but simply integral parts of the Government's general Budget.

BETTER METHODS OF FISCAL CONTROL

In order to promote more satisfactory methods of budgetary control in the Government, I propose this year to inaugurate the policy of having a summation of the Budget prepared for publication immediately after the Congress has acted on all financial matters. This summation will be ready on or before July 1, unless the Congress is still in session. It will be presented along the lines of the General Budget Summary and supporting schedules, including Statements Nos. 1 and 2, as shown in this Budget. It will exhibit the revenue estimates, so revised by the Treasury, as to reflect any changes in the economic situation during the preceding 6 or 7 months and also any revisions made by the Congress in the tax laws. It will provide a complete summary of all appropriations and expenditure authorizations made by the Congress and related estimates of expenditures. Lastly, it will indicate the need for executive or administrative measures in controlling the execution of the Budget during the fiscal year 1936.

A substantial reduction in the number of appropriation items would facilitate the exercise of budgetary control over expenditures and at the same time make for departmental economy. I, therefore, recommend that the Congress establish a special joint committee to make a detailed study of the appropriation items in each regular appropriation bill with a view to greatly reducing the number of them, consistent with proper budgetary and accounting requirements.

It is my belief that substantial adherence to the general recommendations and total figures presented in this Budget will accomplish three major objectives: (1) The normal functions of the United States Government can be carried on with economy and a high standard of efficiency, (2) the broad obligation of the Government to use all proper efforts to prevent destitution can be maintained under more practical methods than we are using at present, and (3) the excellent credit of the Government will be maintained for the common good.

I believe that the Congress will sustain these objectives.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

JANUARY 3, 1935.

APPENDIX

TEXT OF LEGISLATION RECOMMENDED IN CONNECTION WITH THE BUDGET FOR 1936

TITLE —. ECONOMY PROVISIONS

SEC. —. Title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 11. (a) The following sections, as amended, of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933, are hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936: Sections 107 (except paragraph (5) of subsection (a) thereof and subsection (b) thereof) (special salary reductions); 206 (except subsections (a) and (b) thereof) (reducing travel allowances); 214 (authorizing temporary assignments in the Postal Service); 317 (authorizing transfers of appropriations); and 323 (reducing jurors' and witnesses' fees).

"(b) Section 18 of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1934 (suspending reenlistment allowances), is hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936.

"(c) Section 8 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934 (involuntary separation from Government service), is amended by striking out 'July 1, 1935' and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1936.'

"(d) For the purpose of continuing the sections enumerated in subsections (a) and (b) of this section, in the application of such sections with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936: The figures '1933' shall be read as '1936'; the figures '1934' as '1936' (except in the case of the second proviso of such section 317); and, in the case of the first proviso of such section 317, the figures '1935' shall be read as '1938', and the figures '1934' shall be read as '1937', and the figures '1933' shall be read as '1936'."

SEC. —. Notwithstanding the suspension during the fiscal years 1933, 1934, and 1935 of the longevity increases provided for in the tenth paragraph of section 1 of the Pay Adjustment Act of 1922, the personnel (active or retired) so affected shall be credited with service rendered subsequently to June 30, 1932, in computing their active or retired pay accruing subsequently to June 30, 1935: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as authorizing the payment of back longevity pay for the fiscal years 1933, 1934, and 1935 which would have been paid during such years but for the suspension aforesaid.

BIRTHDAYS OF SENATORS GLASS AND FLETCHER

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, since the Congress met, a Member of this body who has served for a long time in public positions of trust and honor has come to another birthday. I should not feel warranted in mentioning the number of his most recent birthday if it were not for the fact that the Associated Press and other publicity agencies have sent throughout the Nation the astounding information that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on the 4th day of January was 77 years old. [Laughter.]

It is a surprising and pleasing thing that one of the temperament of Mr. GLASS, possessed of the ability and energy which he has displayed in the performance of public duties, should through all the years, with all the turmoil, the trouble, and the strife incident to hard labor, retain a youthful appearance and a youthful spirit. The Senator himself, his friends and relatives, and the country are to be congratulated on the fact that at an advanced age, when the powers and faculties of many who have rendered notable service have begun to fail, he is still the same virile, forceful, aggressive, useful citizen and officer that he was in the earlier years of his life when he came to distinction.

I should not take my seat without naming another Member of this body, the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who, according to the Associated Press and other great publicity agencies, has reached the advanced age of 76 years. During the last session of the Congress no Senator, whether he was young or old, labored more continuously or more efficiently than did the Senator from Florida. Some of the most notable new-deal measures, as we have come to speak of them—measures which we believe are inseparably connected with any helpful program for national recovery—were sponsored by him; and under his leadership their details were worked out, brought before the Senate, and carried to successful conclusion, not only in this body but in the conferences which followed their passage through the Senate.

I am happy to have the privilege of assuming to speak for all my associates in the Senate, and to express the pride and pleasure which we feel in extending greetings and good wishes to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. [Applause.]

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire merely to express my indebtedness to the Senator from Arkansas for his kind references to me personally. I greatly appreciate the sentiments expressed by the Senator, and I thank Senators for their action in reference thereto. I am not advertising the birthday, but perhaps the "Spirit of '76" is still alive, and I am very glad to join in that spirit.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I very deeply prize the good opinion of my colleagues; and I will say further that the chief compensation to me for public service has been the affectionate regard, confidence, and cooperation of the Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES AND AGRICULTURE IN THE SOUTH

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. Oscar Johnston, manager of the cotton pool, United States Department of Agriculture, delivered before the southeastern regional meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce at Birmingham, Ala., on November 20, 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By your invitation you requested that the subject of my talk be Government Policies and Agriculture in the South and that particular attention be given under this general subject to (a) land utilization, (b) acreage reduction, and (c) processing taxes. To go with great particularity into the various ramifications and details of the intricate problem which confronts the farmers of America and with the solution of which the Department of Agriculture is now engaged, would require much more time than could be allotted on your program. In the time at my disposal I shall undertake to review briefly what has been done by the Government under the present administration with respect to southern agriculture.

The Congress enacted the Agricultural Adjustment Act on May 12, 1933. By this act the newly appointed Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, was authorized to establish what has come generally to be known as the "Triple A", the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. This Administration, under the guidance of the Secretary, immediately undertook to deal with the emergency then existing with respect to cotton.

For commercial purposes, when we refer to agriculture in the South we mean cotton. You of the southeastern district will recall that at the time of the establishment of the Triple A the cotton situation was indeed chaotic. The efforts of the Farm Board had proved worse than futile, the Board was discredited, the Stabilization Corporation was bankrupt; most, if not all, of the cotton cooperative marketing associations which had cooperated with the efforts at stabilization made by the Farm Board were bankrupt; there was a carry-over or supply of more than 13¼ million bales of American cotton on hand; an enormous acreage had been planted by desperate farmers seeking to save themselves from ruin by mass or quantity production; the season was propitious, indicating that the 1933 yield would be almost a record one; foreign customers were turning to other cottons largely because of their inability to obtain dollar exchanges with which to purchase American cotton even at the ridiculously low price of 5¾ cents per pound; southern agriculture was prostrate; millions of acres of farming lands were passing from the hands of the owners into the hands of mortgage companies and lending agencies who had in betters days made loans against these lands.

Farmers were unable to pay their taxes, and millions of acres were going off the tax rolls, reverting to the States for delinquent taxes. The patient was indeed critically ill; drastic action was necessary if his life was to be saved. Confronted with this condition, the Triple A, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, called on the cotton producers of America to take heroic and unprecendented action—they were asked to go into their fields in August, with the crop already approaching maturity, and to plow up or otherwise destroy one-fourth of the prospective crop of 1933. Details of the campaign were worked out under truly war-time pressure. Appreciating that the farmer had borrowed money with which to plant and cultivate his crop, and that he could not be reasonably expected to destroy one-fourth of it without being compensated, arrangements were made to pay rentals and benefits to the extent of the average cost of bringing the crop to the point at which it was destroyed; for this purpose the Treasury of the United States advanced to the Administration approximately $125,000,000, which was distributed amongst more than a million farmers cooperating in the campaign, which has now come to be generally known as the "plow-up program of 1933." More than a million producers of cotton signed contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture agreeing to comply with this plow-up program. By this program a crop of 17,500,000 bales in prospect in August 1933 was reduced to an ultimate harvested crop of approximately 13,000,000 bales. A planted acreage of slightly more than 40,000,000 acres was reduced to approximately 30,000,000 acres, and the 1933 crop was sold at approximately 10 cents per pound, as compared with approximately 6 cents received by the farmers for the crops of 1931 and 1932. The American carry-over was reduced from 13,250,000 bales as of August 1, 1932, to 10,600,000 bales as of August 1, 1934. In connection with the plow-up program, the Administration inaugurated what has come to be known as the "10-cent loan plan." The Commodity Credit Corporation was established and in the early part of the marketing season of 1932 announced to the world that it would make loans to cotton producers at the rate of 10 cents per pound on cotton classing low middling or better. This was not intended as a price-fixing effort, but was intended to enable those cotton farmers so desiring to withhold their cotton from the market during the harvesting period and to feed it to the market as the market would take it, thus permitting the producer to get the benefit of the expected gradual rise in values.

Just how well this program worked is indicated by the fact that producers of 2,600,000 bales availed themselves of the benefit of this loan and borrowed, in round figures, $130,000,000; the market gradually advanced from 10 cents to 13 cents, and during that upward trend farmers marketed four-fifths of the cotton against which they had borrowed, as the market was in a position to absorb it until the quantity of cotton remaining under the 10-cent loan had been reduced on October 31, 1934, to 500,000 bales, against which there are outstanding loans aggregating $25,000,000.

I deem it unnecessary to take time here to point to the economic improvement which took place throughout the entire Cotton Belt as a direct immediate result of the 1933 program. Every business man in America knows of what is generally referred to as the remarkable or marvelous "come-back" that has been staged throughout the Cotton Belt. The measures adopted were heroic, unprecedented, and were by many regarded as intensely radical. In my judgment the result has justified the means.

Encouraged by the remarkable unanimity with which producers cooperated in the program of 1933, the producers themselves almost unanimously demanded a continuation of a control program with the hope that by appropriate control measures the carry-over of 10,600,000 bales might be further reduced, the ultimate goal being a normal carry-over of around 5,000,000 bales. In response to the demand of the cotton producers the 1934–35 cotton-acreage-control program was worked out by the administration, contracts were submitted to the producers, and it is estimated that 90 percent of the producers of cotton in America signed these contracts, agreeing to reduce the normally planted acreage by approximately 14,000,000 acres, 40 percent of the normal acreage. As a result of this program the planted acreage for 1934 was cut to approximately 28,000,000 acres. We have now in prospect a crop of 9,600,000 bales.

During the progress of the campaign for obtaining the signatures of producers to the 1934–35 acreage-reduction contract considerable feeling and animosity was developed by those who were cooperating in the voluntary program against the 10 or 15 or possibly 20 percent of producers who appeared unwilling to cooperate, and out of this animosity arose a demand on the part of the cooperating producers for legislation to compel the dissenting minority to come into the program. In answer to this demand there was enacted the Bankhead bill, intended to limit and control the production to a maximum of 10,000,000 bales. Undoubtedly, a great many producers who otherwise would not have cooperated in the voluntary program signed up the contracts and reduced acreage through fear of the consequences of the Bankhead law.

The 1933 plow-up came too late in the season to permit the adoption of any extended or well-developed program for the utilization of land that was then taken out of cotton. Farmers were encouraged to plant those lands to cover crops and late fall and winter forage and feed crops. Most producers throughout the Cotton Belt took advantage of this opportunity to produce both food and feed crops for man and beast. In connection with the 1934 acreage-reduction program, a carefully thought-out and well-developed program was adopted. Producers reducing their cotton acreage were permitted and encouraged to utilize the land thus available for the production of those crops to which such lands are best adapted. The Cotton Belt has produced this year many millions of pounds of foodstuff and feedstuff, and is probably more nearly self-sustaining and "living at home" than ever before since the Civil War. The so-called "rented acreage" may not be utilized by farmers for the production for market of such basic commodities as corn, tobacco, wheat, dairy products, etc. Cooperating producers were asked to, and in the main did, permit tenants to use a portion of the rented acreage for garden purposes and for pasture of domestically used livestock.

This whole program contemplates bringing about throughout the Cotton Belt a more nearly balanced farming to encourage the farmer to live at home, to utilize an appreciable part of his land for the production of food and feed crops for domestic use, and to grow his cotton as a cash crop on that land which is best naturally adapted to the production of cotton. The area of tillable soil throughout the Cotton Belt is capable of supporting a population many, many times greater than the entire population of the United States, and at the same time to produce as much American cotton as the world will consume, provided the acreage be intelligently utilized.

The foregoing are the activities of the Government with respect to Southern Agriculture. The existing contract between the Secretary of Agriculture and 90 percent of the producers of cotton authorizes a maximum acreage reduction for 1935 of 25 percent. Such a reduction will give us next year an acreage of approximately 31,000,000 acres. Students of conditions are giving careful consideration to this subject, and the Department will announce at an early date, definitely what the 1934 reduction will be. By its terms the Bankhead law is only applicable for 1934 unless it shall be extended by Executive proclamation. A referendum will shortly be held to ascertain the wishes of the cotton producers. It is safe to say that if this referendum indicates that two-thirds of producers of cotton desire the continuation of the compulsory program, the law will be effective in 1935 unless in the meantime declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. I make this observation here because there is pending litigation by which it is sought to test the validity of the law. There is also the possibility of the repeal of the act or of its drastic amendment by Congress; several Senators having recently declared an intent to attempt the repeal or modification of the act.

The efforts of the administration to reduce to normal the extraordinary surplus of American cotton, which accumulated as a result of two successive bumper crops, coming when the entire world was suffering in the throes of a general economic depression, have been criticized and attacked as being responsible for the decline in exports which we are now witnessing. It is pointed out that to date the exports for the current fiscal year are 1,623,482 bales, as compared with 2,947,806 bales exported during the same period in 1933. It is said that the production-control program and the 12-cent loans now being made to producers have resulted in bringing the price of American cotton above and, therefore, out of line with prices at which cotton is being offered on the markets by Brazil, India, and Egypt, and that this disparity is resulting in an increased consumption of foreign production and a corresponding decreased consumption of American cotton abroad. Undoubtedly comparative prices influence to some extent the selection of cotton to be used by foreign mills. It is equally true that the American farmer cannot, unaided, be expected to produce cotton on a price level with countries where the standard of living is lower than in America. The living standard of the American cotton producer is probably the lowest in America, his hours of work are longer, and his remuneration lower than any other class of labor; but, low as it is, it, it is much higher than in India or Brazil. The American producer will not take kindly to the suggestion that he further lower his standard of living and at the same time continue toiling for the benefit of protected industries in America. In this situation we have a problem that challenges our best thought. It is probable that this situation will have to be dealt with first as an emergency to be handled by a subsidy to the American cotton producer to offset the protection afforded industry by the tariff, and that the ultimate and permanent solution will be a modification of our tariff laws and development of our international relations.

Here, however, I wish to challenge the correctness of the allegation frequently made that American cotton is selling at an artificial price, resulting from the application of the cotton program to production and marketing, and that this price is directly responsible for the falling off in exports. I maintain that the lowered exports result from other major factors. In the first place the decline in exports is not so great as is indicated by the figures just quoted. In 1933 America devalued her dollar; there was a rush of American dollars from abroad for investment in American commodities. This brought about an abnormal export in 1933, and we are now comparing the figures of 1934 with the abnormal figures of 1933. The supply of American dollars or exchange abroad was greatly reduced or exhausted by the end of 1933, and then we realized that with our cheap dollar we are not in a position to buy commodities from countries whose money has not been correspondingly depreciated. As a result of this, such countries are unable to get American exchange. A notable example is Germany. In the past Germany has purchased annually approximately 10 percent of the American production. During the first 3 months of 1933 Germany took 400,000 bales of American cotton. During the first 3 months of 1934 she has taken 148,000. Representatives of German mills advise me that price is not a factor. They are willing to pay an appreciable premium above our prevailing price if they can be provided with American exchange by selling to America the normal quantity of merchandise heretofore imported by America from Germany. The major cause of the shrinkage in exports is due to inability of foreign consumers to obtain American exchange. The next important factor being generally overlooked is that the foreign consumption of all cotton has declined just as our domestic consumption for 1934 is showing a marked decline as compared with 1933. Another factor is that a considerable supply of cotton was acquired abroad in 1933, thus obviating the necessity for heavy buying in the early part of 1934. The Anti-Dumping Act of 1921 and the countervailing-duties provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930 constitute serious impediments to normal trade relations between American and gold-standard countries. These laws must be avoided or amended to permit resumption of normal trade relations. When our international relations have been straightened out and normal international trade resumed, when appropriate reciprocal tariff agreements, protecting the interest of agriculture, have been made, prices will in the main adjust themselves.

In the beginning it was recognized that production control, while necessary in the emergency with which we were confronted and, possibly, necessary in the future to prevent gross overproduction, cannot alone accomplish anything approaching permanent improvement of the position of the cotton producer. Production control is and must be auxiliary to and subordinate to a broader economic program. America has produced for many years approximately one-half of the cotton grown in the world. American cotton is desired throughout the world for its spinning qualities. Normally, 55 percent of the American crop goes into export. Hundreds of millions of dollars of American money are brought back to America every year and distributed throughout the Nation as a result of our export of cotton. The export of from six to eight million bales of cotton annually has brought into America from a half billion to a billion dollars. The export of cotton plays an important part in balancing imports and exports in our dealings with the world. It is highly important, not to the Cotton Belt alone but to all America, that foreign markets continue to absorb a large proportion, in fact, the major portion of America's annual production of cotton. To aid in this direction, there is under serious consideration the matter of the adoption of what is known as the "domestic-allotment plan" under which the producer would receive a subsidy on that portion of his crop which represents his proportion of the domestically consumed cotton. The thought behind this is that American cotton would sell at world prices, but that to enable him to produce cotton at such prices the American producer be given a subsidy on the American-consumed portion of his crop. This plan is justified on the theory that American manufacturers are subsidized through the instrumentality of the tariff. The farmer pays his portion of this subsidy to the manufacturer as a part of the purchase price of almost every article he purchases from his cradle to his coffin; and if he must buy in a protected market and sell in a world market, he must be subsidized. This plan, like plans for acreage and production control, is or should be auxiliary and subordinate to the big idea which must be developed for the protection of American agriculture.

There is a great deal to be said upon the subject of the processing tax. So long as rents, benefits, and/or subsidies must be paid to farmers of America in connection with the production of cotton, corn, wheat, hogs, tobacco, rice, and dairy products, funds for these payments must be provided, and I know of no more appropriate method of providing these funds than through the instrumentality of a processing tax. The incidence of the tax in special cases may be inequitable; minor injustices may be done. More scientific and accurate methods of distributing these taxes may be developed; but so long as America protects industry by a tariff wall, and so long as the farmer must support industry by a concealed subsidy which he pays with the price of the goods he purchases, just so long is it going to be necessary to continue the collection of the processing tax or its equivalent in some form. That Member of our National Congress who determines to vote to repeal the act providing for the processing tax must first determine that rents and benefits shall not be paid to American producers of agricultural commodities. It is not an answer to say that these benefits may be paid from the general funds of the Treasury. Practical experience of the American public with "pork barrel" legislation in connection with the building of post offices, customhouses, and other governmental structures inevitably points to and emphasizes the danger that would be experienced should Congress be called upon to allocate a given amount for use in a cotton program, another amount for wheat, another for corn, hogs, etc.; the trading and swapping of votes would be terrific. The jealousies and animosities and sectional antagonisms that would be created would break down the whole program. I repeat, so long as we pay benefits to producers of specific commodities, the funds to be used for that purpose must be derived from the handling and marketing of each commodity.

Agriculture is essential to the existence of the Nation; all wealth annually produced, without exception, comes from the soil or the sea. Man may enhance the value of a commodity by his artistic treatment, but the basic value, the commodity itself, comes from the ground or the sea and results from the human toil and labor. Broadly speaking, America may be divided into two classes—industry and agriculture. Industry embracing the great capital structure of the Nation, our banking systems, railway systems, steamship lines, public-service corporations, manufacturers, and the labor employed by these enterprises. The millions of Americans who may thus be broadly classed for the purposes of this discussion as "industry" do not produce. They play a necessary part in our economy; they contribute to the health and happiness of humanity; but the fact still stands they do not produce, and the Nation could exist, even though in a crude form, without their activities. To the other class, namely, "agriculture", belong those millions who till the soil and bring into existence those commodities with which humanity is fed and clothed. Their labor is essential not only to national but to human existence.

I shall not here take your time to point to the thousands of inequalities and inequities as between the laborers in the two classes, such, for example, as an 8-hour day for the industrial laborer in a protected and well-ventilated house, at a rate of 40 cents to a dollar an hour, as compared with 10, 12, and 15 hours a day, exposed to the cold of winter and the heat of summer, at a rate of 6 to 10 cents an hour, for the farm laborer.

It is my judgment, after much thought and study, that the time has now been reached when America must definitely determine and publicly proclaim that industry and agriculture shall be put upon an equal footing. In the matter of legislative and economic treatment, agriculture has been subordinate to industry since the Civil War. As a result of that unfortunate struggle, control of the Government and the formation of its policies passed into the hands of the eastern section of America—that section is naturally more keenly interested in the development of industry than in agriculture. The result is, whether consciously or subconsciously, that the trend of our legislation, the building of our economic structure, has been with first consideration for industry.

This situation has become intolerable. That vast army of workers, working in the field from before sunup until after sundown, are getting more than just restless; they are becoming rebellious, and it does not require a prophet nor the son of a prophet to forecast their action unless Congress shall immediately take cognizance of the situation, quit making noble gestures toward agriculture, quit talking about extending more credit or making it easier for the farmer to get in debt, quit administering narcotics, opiates, and palliatives and really deal with the fundamental problem of agriculture, discontinue the policy of reclaiming millions of acres of land through one department of the Government while taking out of production other millions through another department; give proper consideration to the welfare of agriculture in the negotiation of international treaties and trade agreements, discontinue the policy of fostering and playing fairy godfather for every sort of a manufacturing enterprise that may be sought to be developed in America without regard to the future effect of that development upon agriculture, carefully plan both our internal and external economic conditions and relations with due regard to the welfare of the American farmer, rewrite our tariff laws so as to open up foreign markets to those of our agricultural commodities of which we were producing an exportable surplus before industry began the export of any of its manufactures. This need not be hurriedly nor drastically done, but it must be done with a firm hand and a fixed purpose and determination to restore world markets to American agriculture. The manufacturer of an article of which 7 to 10 percent of the production is exported, and 90 to 93 percent domestically consumed, is short-sighted when he demands treaty agreements and trade arrangements to protect his 7-percent export at the expense of agriculture. Develop American agriculture, give to the farm laborer and the producer of our agricultural commodities the same return for his labor and investment as is given to industry, and the buying power of agricultural America will be increased to a point that will enable industry to develop production at a profit. Choke and starve American agriculture and American industry must die.

It is neither my thought nor purpose to suggest that our Government should accord preferential treatment to agriculture over industry, but rather to suggest that our domestic laws and our international treaties be framed with always the thought that industry and agriculture must be coordinated. That the agricultural laborer be on a parity with the industrial laborer; that the agriculturalist should receive an equal return with the industrialist upon capital invested. I should like to point out that history discloses that most, if not all periods of so-called "panics" or economic depressions, are preceded by agricultural distress and low-priced commodities, and that recoveries follow agricultural recovery. After all, industry is dependent upon agriculture. Given a suitable and proper buying power and the buying by farmers of America will start the wheels of industry humming. The captains of industry of America should realize that the greatest market in the world for American manufacturers is in America. The production of our manufactures can be planned and economically controlled. The production of agriculture cannot be planned or controlled with any degree of accuracy. For this reason industry must plan its production to meet the requirements of the world for its manufactures, while agriculture must plant for a harvest to meet the needs of the world, but at the will of Providence may, as a result of such planting, produce in excess of world demand, or, as was the case this year in Oklahoma and Texas, witness a crop failure. Appropriate planning must be done to meet either of these abnormal contingencies.

To accomplish real and permanent agricultural relief there must be first a recognition on the part of the people of the agricultural South and the Middle West of the fact that their interests are common and identical. If the great area given over to the production of wheat, oats, corn, hogs, and dairy products, and the 12 or 14 States engaged principally in the production of cotton join hands in our National Congress and stand pat for drastic fundamental remedial legislation, refusing to be bought off by McNary-Haugen bills, promises of loans, promises of cash rentals and benefits, we can accomplish something. Until the South and the Middle West form such a coalition, agriculture will continue to be subordinate to industry. The Middle West and Northwest have awakened to the situation more keenly than the South. I urge upon southern leaders the recognition of their duty to the South to arouse the people of the South to the seriousness of the situation. Since 1865, the South has suffered from a political inferiority complex. The southerner must throw off this feeling, must demand that his national representatives in the Halls of Congress take a more important part in shaping our national policies. The recent election, coupled with the seniority rule, has brought to the chairmanship of the important committees in the Senate and House, men from the South. The Middle West has turned to the Democratic Party; we have a President who is keenly interested in national development and who recognizes the necessity for bringing agriculture to parity with industry; we have a Secretary of Agriculture who is farm-minded, a deep, keen, and intelligent student of agricultural economics, who recognizes as probably no other Secretary of Agriculture has ever recognized, that almost the very existence of agriculture is dependent upon a broad coalition, a joining of forces between the South and West to promote their common welfare. The time is indeed ripe, the opportunity at hand, for our statesmen and political leaders to look the situation squarely in the face and to put agriculture upon a plane of equality with capital and industry in America. If the opportunity is lost by inaction, farm unrest will increase, farm strikes will become the order of the day, agitators will spring up all over agricultural America, socialism in its worst phases will be encouraged, agriculture will languish, the recovery of industry will be blocked, and we will find that we have not plumbed the depths of depression during the last 2 years. Provide for the recovery of agriculture, on the other hand, and see how rapidly our Nation will come back. Draw a lesson from the results of a single year's program in the Cotton Belt, but keep in mind that those results will be temporary unless a permanent agricultural policy is developed.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD AND DRUGS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, Senators will find on their desks this morning a new food and drug bill. Many have asked me how it differs from the original act. I have ventured to prepare a statement relative thereto, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD for the enlightenment of all who are interested.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For a number of years the Food and Drug Administration has been embarrassed by weaknesses in the food and drug laws. The original act was a revolutionary and epoch-making piece of legislation. It will ever stand as a monument to the great pioneer in pure food and drugs, Dr. Harvey W. Wiley.

Naturally, during a period of more than a quarter of a century, there would arise new problems and the necessity for further protection of the public. Court decisions have clarified and in some instances befuddled the law. The officials of the Administration have been embarrassed by reason of weaknesses which have become apparent through the progress of invention, discovery, and legal procedure.

In June 1933 a bill was presented after numerous conferences in the Department of Agriculture with consumers and the various industries affected. When that bill reached the Senate there arose a good deal of opposition. Days and weeks of hearings resulted in numerous revisions. The measure laid on the desks of Senators today differs from S. 1944 of the Seventy-third Congress in several particulars. Some of them are the following:

The first bill gave to the Secretary conclusive power in certain instances as regards findings of fact. This is now left to the court if a contest arises.

The old bill did not include any provision for court review of regulations. While that right existed under the common law, it has seemed wise to write into the bill a provision providing specifically for such review.

In place of the official authority given the Secretary under the original bill to promulgate rules and regulations, this bill sets up two committees for the formulation of regulations. These are a committee on public health and a committee on food standards.

The original bill required a declaration of ingredients to be placed upon the package reaching the consumer. The industries affected resented this because of what they regard to be their proprietary rights in the formulas. This feature of the first bill and of its successors in the last Congress created much discussion.

In the measure now pending, equal protection of the public is accomplished by another method. Unless the package carries the names and quantities of the ingredients contained therein, this information must be filed with the Department. Such action will permit the Food and Drug Administration to make certain that no incompatibles, harmful substances, or unwholesome products are sold to the American people. Existing law is not changed in that the Department will continue to make its own analyses of products and to advise the public of any wrongful or fraudulent claims for them.

It is the purpose of this bill not alone to protect the public but, what is likewise important, to protect the industries involved. To this end the committees which are provided by the bill include representation from the industry affected so that it may have abundant opportunity to state its side of the case.

There was much criticism of the original measure due to the misunderstanding of why there was an enumeration of diseases in which self-medication might be dangerous and a proscription of advertising "cures" for such diseases. The list was so long that there arose a fear on the part of the public that the individual would no longer be permitted to buy any favorite preparation and to take it under the directions of the label.

Of course, that was not the intent or the letter of the proposed law, but, nevertheless, it was used as a weapon against its passage. In this bill the diseases for which the advertising of cures is prohibited have been limited to cancer, tuberculosis, venereal diseases, and heart and vascular diseases. These are the diseases for which the virtues and values of remedies have been advertised and which the scientific world believes to be unsubstantiated. The list in this bill is limited, but may be added to from time to time as the Committee on Public Health may recommend.

As to the method of the selection of this Public Health Committee, it is well to quote from the bill. This committee is to "consist of five members designated by the President with a view to their distinguished scientific standing and interest in public health and without regard to their political affiliations." Personnel so chosen must appeal to the American people and guarantee the reasonableness and scientific worth of their conclusions.

There was much complaint from berry growers and others regarding the restrictions placed upon the sale of fresh fruits and vegetables in packages. The bill before us exempts natural products sold in open containers from certain labeling requirements that are not needed for these products but are highly important for foods generally.

The small manufacturers and producers complained of a provision in the original bill providing for voluntary inspection of factories. It was testified that the inclusion of this provision in the bill would result, in fact, in mandatory inspection with the expense of inspection for each and every factory. As a matter of fact, the administration was aiming at the control of certain sea foods. The last Congress passed an amendment to the Food and Drug Act providing for voluntary inspection of the establishments producing these foods. It has worked well in practice, and all parties interested believe it should be continued for those particular products as has been done. The bill does not apply this feature to other substances.

The original bill excited criticism because the Food and Drug Administration was authorized to make what are known as "multiple seizures." There never was any complaint on the part of industries affected when the seizures were made because the products were unwholesome, deleterious, or harmful. There was complaint that the Department might begin proceedings in border-line cases where the health factor was not involved and do so in several parts of the country simultaneously, putting the industry to great expense in defending many suits at the same time.

In view of the fact that this bill provides for injunction proceedings, such authority for wide-spread seizures in border-line cases, involving merely questionable deception, is not needed. The abuse, if the courts sustain the Department's position, can be readily stopped through bringing injunction proceedings in the court where the manufacturer resides and securing a prompt judicial determination of the issues. This method of procedure is provided in the pending bill. It gives the public exactly the same protection as originally contemplated, but it reaches that desired end by a short cut and also assures against the abuse of administrative power.

To the original bill there was great complaint on the part of the advertisers because of the language chosen, which set up a prohibition against false advertising, not alone because it was false or misleading but also because of possible "ambiguity or inference." With the great power given to the Secretary in the original bill, it was felt that injustices would follow the administration of the act without actually giving the public any degree of added protection.

As a matter of fact, all needed protection can be given by a prohibition against false or misleading statements in advertising. Similar language in the present law applicable to the labels has been effectively protective of consumer interests, and at the same time has not been construed as unduly embarrassing to honest producers. This bill applies exactly the same principle to the matter of advertising as existing law does to labeling.

It is felt by those who have gone over the bill carefully that its arrangement is more orderly and capable of better understanding. Certainly the bringing together of similar subjects under appropriate chapter heads makes the bill better suited to study and practical use. A great deal of discussion over the bill as originally introduced undoubtedly arose because it was difficult to follow and understand.

The bill is now in form and ready for study by everybody having an interest in food and drug legislation. If it is enacted into law, the health and welfare of our people will be given much greater protection. It will place no undue burden on honest industry.

It is hoped there may be speedy enactment of the measure; but, of course, this will not be attempted until there has been plenty of time to digest its proposals.

A POLICY OF INGRATITUDE AND DEATH

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have the clerk read at this time the part of a newspaper article which I have marked in black—the headlines and the paper from which it is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Dec. 10, 1934]

More make a million; fewer earn $5,000, tax figures reveal—$1,000,000 income list increased by 26 in 1933, while returns of $5,000 or less decreased 81,000.

Mr. LONG. Now I send to the desk another newspaper, and ask that the headlines may be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune of Dec. 10, 1934]

Million-dollar incomes gain as others decrease—26 more in high bracket in 1933 than 1932, Bureau reports.

Mr. LONG. Now I send to the desk a newspaper article, which I ask that the clerk may read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New Orleans Morning Tribune of Dec. 18, 1934]

PRESIDENT FORBIDS MORE TAXES ON RICH—TELLS CONGRESSMEN INCREASES MIGHT MAKE BUSINESS STAMPEDE

By the United Press

WASHINGTON, December 17.—The administration is determined to prevent any considerable increase in taxes on the very rich, many of whom pay no taxes at all, on the ground that such a plan would cause another stampede by business. Word has been sent up to Democratic congressional leaders that it is essential nothing be done to injure confidence. The less said about distribution of wealth, limitation of earned income, and taxes on capital, "new dealers" feel, the better.

Repeatedly since the Democrats won a two-thirds majority in both Houses in the congressional elections last month, the administration has sought to assure the worker, the taxpayer, and the manufacturer that they had nothing to fear.

Meantime, reports reached the Capital that fear of potential increases in inheritance taxes and gift levies at the coming Congress was in part responsible for the failure of private capital to take up a greater share of the recovery burden.

Mr. LONG. I hope I am not taxing the clerk too much. I have only one more newspaper clipping. I ask to have read the part marked in black in the first column. Then I shall ask no further reading at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New Orleans Item of Jan. 1, 1935]

CLARIFY LAWS OR LOSE CASH, F. D. TELLS LONG—UNEQUIVOCAL ENUNCIATION OF STATE'S POLICY ON NEW LAWS ON PUBLIC DEBTS SUGGESTED IN LETTER TO ALLEN

WASHINGTON, January 1.—President Roosevelt has indirectly informed Senator HUEY P. LONG that the administration is likely to withhold Public Works loans from Louisiana until some of the legislation the Senator put through the State legislature is repealed or clarified.

The President's message to the Louisiana dictator was contained in a letter he sent Gov. O. K. Allen, of Louisiana. The communication was similar in some respects to those sent other Governors, but there were significant differences.

The purpose of Mr. Roosevelt's letter to the State Department was to offer the aid of P. W. A.'s legal staff to draft bills in the various States which would enable municipalities to take better advantage of P. W. A. funds.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will my able friend from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. For a question only.

I ask the able Senator from Louisiana to refer to the paper he sent in which intimated that the President of the United States had sent to the officials of the Government in Congress a message denouncing any idea of any increase of taxes, and a statement that he desired to favor what might be said to be—using the words of the article—the powerful rich. Surely the able Senator from Louisiana does not assume that such a thing ever occurred—that the President ever sent such a message, or that any such message has ever been received by any Congress.

Before the Senator proceeds I will ask his very good opinion, if he believes such a thing ever has existed.

Mr. LONG. I will cover that matter and other matters in the course of my speech, Mr. President. I thank the Senator. I intend to come to that.

Mr. President, all I know is what I read in the papers at this late date. Of course, I can only judge all men, public and private, by their actions and by their conduct. I do not undertake to interpret the motives of men. In other words, we were taught in our old study of law that men intend the ordinary consequences of their acts. About the first thing we charge to a jury in a criminal or a civil case is that every man is understood in the light that he knows the customary consequences of what he does.

I knew the consequences of what the President of the United States was doing last year when he was doing it, and I told him so. I knew the consequences of what the President of the United States was doing year before last, and told him so. In January 1932 I knew the consequences of what President Hoover was doing and said so from this floor. The saddest words that we have to tell these distinguished and illustrious men—some of whom we helped to make, and made them too big to talk to thereafter—are: "I told you so."

Clipping No. 1 that I sent to the desk reports that the billionaire is becoming a bigger billionaire; that the millionaire is becoming a bigger millionaire; that the poor is becoming poorer, and the middle class is falling into the class of the poor.

Mr. President, that would not be so bad if it were not a fact that these news articles of the Associated Press and of the United Press are based upon the reports of the United States departments and of the United States Census in which it is shown, as a complete reading of these dispatches will show that year by year and day by day, just as surely as we progress in any direction, without the slightest interruption and without the slightest cessation, regardless of the talk that has been uttered in this Chamber and of the messages that have come from the pen of the President, day by day and month by month, the rich are becoming richer and the poor are becoming poorer, and those of the middle class are becoming fewer and fewer.

Why? I do not purport to say that the United Press article is correct or incorrect. I do not purport to say that the Associated Press article is correct or incorrect. I do purport to say, however, that the consequences of the policies of both of the Presidents of the United States since I have been in the United States Senate are in line with what the United Press article has stated.

The last article which I sent to the desk was to the effect that the President of the United States had written a letter to somebody else to be read by a dictator down in Louisiana. Some dictator down there somewhere in the bulrushes was intended to get a letter. That is according to the paper that has been sent to the desk, and therefore the letter was addressed to the Governor as a means of communication with the dictator.

In days past and gone I used to communicate with those gentlemen by direct route. When I sent them any money they telephoned me direct. When I was getting them votes they telephoned me direct. I am satisfied that if they intended to communicate with me they would use those customary processes today.

I know of nothing that would have changed the means of communication, nothing that has occurred through the ethereal changes of radio, the conduct and transportation of the mails, the ordinary telegrams that are exchanged to and fro, that would have made any difference in the means of communication with me.

But be that as it may, this article refers to Louisiana legislation. This article intends to infer that laws that have been passed by the Legislature of Louisiana must be altered or repealed; otherwise the United States Government is going to withhold loans and withhold relief in the State of Louisiana.

A subsequent news item, with which I am not so familiar, has said that some of these loans have been approved in Louisiana. It is said that after looking over these Louisiana laws they find they are not so bad, and that some $11,000,000 of loans of the P. W. A. in the State of Louisiana have been allowed to go forward. The main law that has been attacked down there, however, and a set of laws which are in line with it, are these:

I should say in advance that this is not the first intimation we have had of the displeasure of the national administration. We have known that we were displeasing the national administration. That does not make any difference with us. We have known that all along. We have known that our policies down there did not suit the national administration. Now, the national administration may be right about this thing and we may be wrong, but there is a chance that we may be right, and I am going to leave it to the Senate to find out who is right about this proposition. We have not agreed with the national administration in the policy, the trend of which is indicated by the articles that have been sent to the desk.

We enacted laws that propose to take the taxes in the State of Louisiana off the back of the little man entirely, 100 percent; which propose that no man owning a home or owning a farm worth or assessed for less than $2,000 shall pay any taxes whatever on that home or on that farm. That is the basis of this so-called "dictatorship" about which there has been so much complaint heard in the State of Louisiana—that a farmer or a home owner, owning a home worth or assessed for less than $2,000, should pay no taxes, county, district, or State.

In order to get money so that the State government might continue to operate, it was necessary that funds be raised from somewhere. We either had to continue to tax the man of small means or we had to tax someone else in order to support the State government.

What was the relief suggested to us? It was said that a sales tax was the ideal means by which to relieve the people of this property-tax burden, and from one end of the State to the other that was urged as the proper means of relief. But such would have meant that in Louisiana, where more than two-thirds of the property is owned by the big interests, outside of home owners and little business owners in the cities, a much larger share of the burden of taxes would have been placed on the little man than resulted from the property tax already placed upon the little man.

So when I arrived down there we took up these proposed laws. We put a tax on the cotton exchange of 2 cents on every hundred dollars' worth of cotton they sold on future sales, and up went the hubbub, that Mississippi invited the cotton exchange to move out of New Orleans and move to Gulfport, that Houston wanted the cotton exchange to move out of New Orleans and move to Texas. We went back at them and said, "We join with the people of Houston; we join with the people of Gulfport; we want you to leave Louisiana, too, as far as we are concerned, with the New Orleans Cotton Exchange." But, none the less, the tax was voted, and the tax stands, and the cotton exchange still stays in Louisiana.

Another tax we voted was the income tax, another one of these dictatorial laws, terrible dictatorial laws. We had to amend the constitution of the State of Louisiana in order to pass it, because the feudal lords who wrote the constitution of the State of Louisiana in the year 1921, under the benign guidance of that illustrious leader, ex-Governor Parker, wrote into the constitution of Louisiana a provision forbidding the laying of an income tax in the State of Louisiana; that was the effect of the article they wrote. So we imposed an income tax exactly in the words and figures of the income tax of the State of New York and allowed that money to go into a fund for the payment of the taxes theretofore paid by the man whose home was worth $2,000 or less.

What was another one of these dictatorial laws? We imposed a 2-percent tax on public utilities, on the gross earnings of the power companies, of the railroads, of the Pullman Co.—a 2-percent tax on these big concerns. It was said that if these taxes were put upon them it would mean that the power company would immediately raise its rates. It was said that it would mean that the Pullman Co., the railroads, the telegraph companies, and the telephone companies would immediately raise their rates to make up the difference. What happened?

Mr. President, we imposed a 2-percent tax on the gross income and a 4½-percent tax on the net income of these companies. Then we went before the public-service commission, after electing somebody to sit on it instead of those who were on it, and the companies have reduced their rates, even after those taxes have been put on them. That is another of the dictatorial things which it is said makes it necessary that there must be some amendment to the law.

Well and good. We put on a few other taxes. I will not take the time to enumerate them all; but taxes were placed upon the interests and the elements able to bear them so as to shift the taxes away from the others.

Naturally, we had some elections. I shall not discuss them in detail, but from the floor of the Senate here following last January a great deal was said and a great many of my colleagues not infrequently reminded me that there had been an election in the city of New Orleans which had gone adversely to forces with which I was affiliated.

There has been another election there since then and one on top of that since then in which the entire State of Louisiana has voted, as a basis for all these laws concerning which so much has been written in the papers. Before the Legislature of Louisiana could enact them all, as a general proposition—as to some of them it could, but as to most of them it could not—they had to be voted on by the voters of the State of Louisiana at the polls in a popular election.

Mr. President, were those laws voted? They were submitted in the month of November to the people of Louisiana. They were not supported by one single newspaper in the State of Louisiana. They were opposed by every daily newspaper in the State of Louisiana. They were opposed by the old New Orleans ring and the city government in New Orleans. They were opposed by the associations of commerce, the chambers of commerce, the boards of trade, alliances, clubs, the Rotary Club, and every other club on the face of the earth. The result has been that at the polls in Louisiana, by a majority of 7 for to 1 against, these laws have been adopted by the people of the State of Louisiana. We carried the city of New Orleans by a majority of 45,000 votes, and for good measure whipped the ring president of the school board by 30,000 while we were doing it and took him out of office at the same time.

Mr. President, this makes me a dictator! This makes a dictatorship for the State! This calls for dispatches from Washington to the effect that our laws are not republican in form. Why? Because instead of having taken from the bottom to add to the pile of the big men at the top, we have taken from the big men at the top to add to the pile of the little men at the bottom.

Among the laws which we passed was one enacted a few days ago providing for a tax on the Standard Oil Co. As we have been taught to believe in our histories, that is the sacred prophet of this country, the anointed bull which cannot be touched, and we are taught to apply to that institution that sacred commandment, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophet no harm."

We had imposed a severance tax in Louisiana, and everyone was willing to pay the severance tax; but, lo and behold, we had to come to Congress and get a tariff on oil in order to keep the Standard Oil Co. from shutting down our schools. So we got a tariff on oil of about 21 cents a barrel, I believe it was, and that made it impossible for them to haul in Venezuelan oil and shut down the Louisiana oil fields.

Then they were not satisfied. They decided that something had to be done to show that Louisiana was in a deplorable condition. So they concluded that they would use the Mississippi River, for the improvements of which we are bonded for more than a hundred million dollars. We have been bonded for the lands and the levees and the devastations of its floods, the interest annually amounting to something like five or six million dollars, including the cost of the ports we have had to build. Then the Standard Oil Co. concluded they would take their oil from outside of the State from the places where it could be obtained, bring it to the State of Louisiana, and refine it there, but by all means to take it out by barges and boats and pay the State of Louisiana no severance tax, nothing on the expenses of the river, and shut down the oil fields of the State at the same time.

Again we called the legislature into special session. The legislature voted to put on them a 5-cent-a-barrel tax on the business of refining oil, so that if they were not willing to pay the tax on the business of producing oil in the State they could pay a tax on the business of refining oil in the State.

The Standard Oil Co. was invited to move to Alabama, and it was invited to move to other States about the same time; I believe in Georgia somebody sent a similar invitation. We gave them an invitation to get out, to get out of the State of Louisiana, to pay the amount of money it was costing the State of Louisiana for them to use the property and facilities of that State or else to treat the people of Louisiana justly.

I am glad to say that a mutual compromise was reached, under which they agree that they will be willing after a little length of time to pay an occupational license tax of 5 cents a barrel on that part of the oil which they use from outside of the State, and a 1-cent occupational license tax on that part they use which is produced inside of the State. That means more money to go into the till in order to pay the taxes which have been paid by the little man in my State.

Contrast that with the condition in the United States as a whole. I want to show how Louisiana is getting along. I have here an article by a national writer on finance and economics. Louisiana is a State which is supposed to have been denied gratuities of the Federal Government, and we would rather not have some of them, dispensed as they are, than to have them. If the funds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are to be dispensed in the future as they have been dispensed in the past, we would rather they would just draw a red line and eliminate Louisiana from consideration. If they are to dispense the P. W. A. funds in the future as they have in the past, we would not quarrel if they left us out of that.

Before reading the Roger Babson report, I digress to call the attention of the Senate to the case of a poor old blind man by the name of Edward T. Doescher, who lives in the city of New Orleans. He was running a little fruit stand and little grocery store. The police department found out he was not voting right and they closed up his grocery stand.

He tried to go into the business of peddling bread on the street, and they put him out of business as a bread peddler. One ordinance after another they invoked against the poor old blind fellow, until they left him without anything on earth from which to make a living. It was the persecutions of that damnable Choctaw regular ring, which today has the support of this national administration—when I get through the administration will know more about it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to admonish the occupants of the galleries that they are guests of the Senate and that under the rules of the Senate they are not to indulge in any demonstrations but must preserve order.

Mr. LONG. So, Mr. President, this old blind man, in distress, went to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in order to secure a loan to prevent his place from being sold under the hammer. What happened? They had approved a loan. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation and its contractors had O. K.'d and signed a loan, and everything was waiting for it to be consummated, when, lo and behold, they went out to look at the house and there was tacked upon it a sign, "For JOSEPH FERNANDEZ, candidate for reelection to Congress." What happened when they saw that sign tacked up there by this old blind man, indicating that he was going to vote for the reelection to Congress of JOSEPH FERNANDEZ on the Long ticket? When that old man came to testify before the senatorial and representative legislative committee to the atrocities of which he had been a victim in that city, he was immediately notified that that loan was canceled and abrogated, that they would not lend him a 5-cent piece; and up until that day he had never been loaned a dime on that place.

Up in north Louisiana, however, there was a very big and rich oil man by the name of Mr. William Feazel, a man who dispensed the patronage in the parish of Ouachita for the Roosevelt administration, well fixed and able. He borrowed $19,700, I am told, on his home, notwithstanding the handsome income he had at the same time. So we are not going to suffer much if we are left out of some of this so-called "beneficial legislation" which we are undertaking to get.

With it all, Mr. Babson had to render a report. I do not know Mr. Babson. They will probably get hold of him and change this thing after I read it, but here is what he did say. I will present his report, which is published on the front page of the New Orleans Times Picayune of December 29, and he marks a ring around Louisiana and New Orleans as being the particular part of the country showing greater recovery than any other part of the United States. He says that it goes 10 percent above the average. He does not tell why. He says that national-administration laws have done it. Why, national-administration laws have not done anything in New Orleans like they have done in many other places.

What had done it? Why, among these high-handed and dictatorial laws and high-handed and dictatorial actions that had been taken by the Governor of that State, with whom I was cooperating, was one by which we had closed down the lotteries that were operating under the guidance of the New Orleans ring government down there, 2,000 lottery shops; and a red-light district 16 squares long and 18 squares wide—the greatest cesspool of hell that has been known to the modern world—that has been supported by the Roosevelt administration. Who is in charge of it? Well, do not misunderstand me. I said the Roosevelt administration was in charge of it. Now, I do not want Senators to think I am going to take back anything. I am going to show them who was in charge of it.

I have before me an article which appeared in a magazine that they call Real America, and in this article which is published in the issue of December 1934 they have my picture placed in front of the dens of prostitution—the cribs of New Orleans. They have faked a photograph as though I were walking by those places, and they say, "Huey and his New Orleans cribs."

Now, it so happens that there are for-rent signs on those places. We closed the places, and then they put up for-rent signs. So we located these particular places and we sent photographers down there, and took close-up photographs of these particular for-rent signs on those cribs, and I have them here. I will send them to the desk. The sign in one of the photographs says "For rent. Queen Realty Co." Now, who is the Queen Realty Co.? Well, I decided to bring that information to the Senate.

Here is a letter from the secretary of state of Louisiana which says the Queen Realty Co. was organized November 12, 1930, before Edwin J. Prinz, notary public, and that its stockholders are Abraham Burglass, Edward Rightor, and Edwin J. Prinz.

Who is Edwin J. Prinz? He is a lawyer formerly working for Mr. John P. Sullivan.

And here is an affidavit from a responsible citizen, Mr. Nicholas G. Carbajal, swearing that Abraham Burglass stated that Mr. Prinz held the stock for his employer, Colonel Sullivan.

Colonel Sullivan is one stockholder, Mr. E. R. Rightor is listed as the other one, and their partner is Mr. Abraham Burglass. And on the witness stand before the Committee on Finance Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Rightor both testified that they were in charge of the dispensation of patronage for the Roosevelt administration in the State of Louisiana.

So, Mr. President, I wish it to be known in answering this article and others like it, that when we closed up that rotten mess we closed up an institution under the guidance of the New Orleans ring operated for profit by the patronage distributors in Louisiana for the Roosevelt administration.

There came a time when something had to be done about it. The Governor of the State of Louisiana wired to the city of New Orleans that they had to close up that cesspool of hell or the militia would close it. The militia came into New Orleans. Where did the police department go? Did the police department run to the city hall to protect the archives there? Did the police department run to the levee? No. The police department came and stayed that night in the red-light district for fear the militia was going to raid it, and gave notice that if that sacred place was raided they would resist it by an extra 1,000 policemen that they put on the pay roll. They did not guard the Capitoline Hill, the churches, the levee, or the archives; they guarded the red-light district that night—the property of the Roosevelt patronage dispensers in the city of New Orleans.

Now, the laws recently passed in our State do not please these men reporting to the President. These laws do not please these men through whom the President of the United States receives his messages from New Orleans. But it is time that the President of the United States turn and look to the people of Louisiana to send messages, instead of looking to the leaders who have been picked for him by a Tammany boss. It is time that he looked, Mr. President, to the people of Louisiana, the sovereign people of that State, to the ambassadors of that State sent here, and who will be sent here again. I helped to move my own election back to January next year, instead of running in September next year in the primaries, so that it might be made known early just how the people felt.

I want to say here that the President may have been innocently led into this thing, but he has had more warning than any man I ever heard of not to take any of it.

It is said that the waves of civilization have been beating against the shores of Africa for 6,000 years without ever being able to make any impression. But I will say that for nearly 600 days I have been beating these facts against the walls of the United States Senate in the hope that some day they would percolate some intellect through which they might reach the President of the United States to save him from the misguidance he is now receiving.

Why, only last year I produced before the Senate, and had read from this desk day after day and day after day, the reports that came from the banking department—reports that never have been disputed. On the contrary, when the head of the Home Loan Corporation was before the Committee on Finance he looked at the reports of what had been done and denounced them as a fraud, from his own lips.

I produced that information, and more information, in the United States Senate showing that through these loan agencies under the control of the patronage dispensers of the Roosevelt administration in some instances they loaned a man $1,000 and that they took $700 of it for profit. I showed time after time when they loaned $4,000 they took $2,000 of it. The names and dates, the ages and the heights, are all in the records of this Congress.

What did the administration do about it? They did not do a thing on God's earth about it. We could not get them to do anything about it. They left that man Paul B. Habans in charge of it, and he is in charge of it today. He continues such frauds as I read here against the old blind man and in favor of the rich oil operator. And finally we convened the legislature into session to pass one of these so-called "dictatorial laws", to make it a felony for any man to so use those departments as to swindle a man out of his Home Owners' Loan money, and only after Louisiana had forbidden it by penal statute were we able to stop this particular form of swindle that had persisted in that State from the very tentacles of the national administration in Washington through the appointment of those in charge in Louisiana.

Those are undisputed facts. And why would a people be afflicted with that kind of treatment? What is the reason for it? Because they say—I can only state what they say—because they say that the senior Senator from Louisiana is at outs with the Roosevelt administration, and that as long as the people of Louisiana are at outs with the Roosevelt administration through their senior Senator, that it is impossible for them to have other than publicly repudiated characters of that kind and stock manipulating the funds and affairs that affect and afflict that State from Washington. That is the reply we get.

Here are the facts, then: Mr. Babson says that Louisiana, in spite of all that can be done against it, with all the afflictions that can be urged upon it, Louisiana, none the less, rises and rises and continues to rise to the top of the heap—not, however, by reason of what has been done from Washington.

A short time ago the administration said to us that they wanted to appoint their own man down there to dispense the relief money. We said, "That satisfies us." They sent a young man down there to do it, and the job was turned over to him. Great newspaper write-ups were given. Over in Arkansas the Governor dispenses the relief through his own appointee. Over in Mississippi, I think, the Governor does the same thing. But, lo and behold, a great deal of claptrap came out that Louisiana was refusing to donate the proper amount to relief, and that they were going to have to withdraw from the State. I was informed at the same time, Mr. President, that the sister States to Louisiana were not contributing anything to this unemployment-relief fund. I may be wrong about that. I am giving you my information. I was informed that neither Mississippi nor Arkansas were contributing to that relief fund. Yet it was being administered by their Governors' own selections, as I understood, in both of those States. But, no, they had to have something from Louisiana. And so we assembled the legislature into special session and we got that something. We put 25 cents more tax on the corporation franchises and gave that to them, Mr. President. We gave them about $450,000 a year. But we gave it to them from the proper source.

Somebody suggested a sales tax. But we said, "Oh, no. Here is a better method to get the money." And so we gave them 25-cents-on-the-dollar taxes on corporations, I think it was, or a guaranty of around $450,000 a year. That much more, I am told, we gave than others.

Now, it may be in these other States they are giving more than that. It may be that Arkansas and Mississippi, which are on our north and our east, are doing that much or better, although I was informed to the contrary. But at least this much I wish the Senate to know, that a telegram was sent by the administrator of the relief funds that Louisiana had done everything on God's living earth that could be expected of that State in the way of contributing to the relief fund, notwithstanding the fact that our sovereign State was told that instead of the Governor selecting someone of his own choice that they wanted to send somebody else that was of their choice, because we were in bad with the national administration.

I have that telegram, and I send that telegram to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

BATON ROUGE, LA., November 16, 1934.

HARRY L. HOPKINS,
Federal Emergency Relief Administrator,
1734 New York Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.:

It affords me a great deal of pleasure to report that the Louisiana Legislature in special session has voted all parishes authority to assess a special tax to be used exclusively for unemployables and mothers' aid cases. This tax, if exclusively resorted to, together with the State discretionary fund available through a 25-cents-per-thousand franchise tax voted in the August special session, will insure, we believe, adequate care on F. E. R. A. standards. The bills under Senator LONG's sponsorship passed unanimously today. Senator LONG has cooperated fully and has complied with every request I, as administrator for Louisiana, have made of him. I am sure you will be gratified as I have been.

HARRY J. EARLY.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we cannot cooperate in the policy of the national administration—and why? Because there are today 5,000,000 more people on the dole than there were a year ago. We cannot cooperate with that kind of system; not that we are against placing them on the dole, but with a policy which makes it necessary to place 5,000,000 more on the dole. We cannot cooperate with the policy of the administration, because 1,000,000 more people are unemployed. We cannot follow a policy which leads to more unemployment. We cannot follow the policies of the national administration because the earnings of the millionaire and billionaire are on the up-grade, while the earnings of the common man and the poor people are on the down-grade. Therefore, we cannot cooperate in policies of that kind. Unquestionably we cannot put our head in the noose and follow along a blind and beaten path which means wreckage of the national administration if it does not mean wreckage for us at the same time.

There is another little beacon light which will show Members of the Senate where we are going. Several friends said this morning to me, "Where are we headed?" I am going to give you a little light so you will know where we are headed. According to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation we may know where we are headed. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has said that after analyzing the bank accounts in the United States it has found that one one-hundred-and-fiftieth — get that! — one one-hundred-and-fiftieth part of the bank depositors own two-thirds of the money that is in the banks. Not one one-hundred-and-fiftieth part of all the people, but one one-hundred-and-fiftieth part of the people who have money to put in banks own two-thirds of the money that is on deposit in the banks. Do Senators want to know where we are headed? We are headed just as straight to hell as any bullet ever went to its mark.

What has been done for the few men? When Mr. Roosevelt was nominated as a candidate for President of the United States he knew where we were headed. He said so. I remember yet the great sense of satisfaction I felt when I came out of the Chicago convention, with headlines screaming that there was a Wheeler-Dill-Long senatorial bloc advocating the redistribution of wealth and that that bloc would be powerful. Where are the members of that bloc today? Dill has quit. WHEELER might as well have quit. I have been worse than he has been because I have fought hard every day.

But that is not all. There were men who left their party to fight for this cause; men who owed their seats in the United States Senate to the Republican or independent voters of their States, men who owed their appointments to Republican governors. Among them was a Senator who came from the State of New Mexico, who left the selection of his party, who left his party, who cast his lot and everything he had with those who he believed were fighting for the salvation of humanity, who offered to sacrifice himself on the altar that he might fight to make man free. After he adopted and fought for the cause that he thought more liberal he was followed back to his home State where he naturally expected to be repudiated by the party which had sent him to the United States Senate. There he found that the same national administration which he helped to make was hounding him from post to pillar, but he was elected over their damnable opposition and sent back to this body. I shall not be surprised to see them try to kick him out of here even now. God help the country under such circumstances as that!

I wonder if my friend the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] realizes the sincere motives behind those people who had every kind of offer to stay loyal to the old element and not go wafting away with this so-called "program that was going to make a search for the forgotten man"? What an example to hold out from this party to the men of the future!

We know that in normal times the Democratic vote is not the majority vote in the United States. It has not been since the Civil War. The Democrats of the United States have not been the majority party in the matter of votes. We have had to get the Progressives and some of the Republicans in order that we might win. We have set a beautiful beacon light, Mr. President. We have invited these men into our ranks and when they came in we have undertaken to persecute them from city to city, not for anything they are trying to get but for what they held before they threw their lot with us for the salvation of the American people. I may be tried in an election next January down in Louisiana. Just send down there and try me a lick on this thing in this way! We moved the election in Louisiana earlier by a year so they can try me if they want to do it.

Mr. President, I had a little experience myself. When I came to the Senate I got into a little fight over a few matters. I probably should have listened more in the early days I was here, in the year 1932. I probably should have had a little less to say. It would have been better for me and perhaps better for the country for all I know. But it was for the benefit of the country and it had to be done if the present man in the White House was to get there. We had to have every vote we could get. Do not fool yourselves, Senators. We needed them all. One break in the line and we were gone at the Chicago convention and we knew it. No one knew it better than I did.

I was sent and I went with approval to conciliate and negotiate, if you call it that, to dicker, if you wish to call it that, with delegations from many States to try to get their support on the first, second, third, or any other roll call we could in order to nominate this man Roosevelt. I want to tell you, Mr. President, I had nothing in common with Tammany. But I went to Tammany and tried to line up Tammany. It was known that I went to Tammany. I went to Tammany at midnight; I went to see Mr. Jimmie Walker and Mr. John Curry, and our main forces knew all about it, and we tried mighty hard to get them. We did everything we could to get them. I did not go there without everybody knowing I was there. We did not know the lines could hold long enough to nominate our man. They had made unfortunate terms in agreeing on a man for permanent chairman of the Chicago convention, Mr. Jouett Shouse. If Mr. Jouett Shouse had been made permanent chairman of the Chicago convention there was not a hope on God's living earth that we should ever be able to nominate Roosevelt for President and he knew it.

We had to have a man friendly to us at least in fair respects, and perhaps in other respects. So we had to break the deal that had been made by Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt approved it. It had been made with the approval and with the sanction and with the consent of Mr. Roosevelt. When we went to him to save the day we told him we had to break that thing one way or the other. That is why we had to get down on our hands and knees and work from night until morning and from morning until night to try to save the Chicago convention for the Roosevelt forces.

We were going to break the two-thirds rule. I am the man given credit for trying to break the two-thirds rule, but I was not the man. I was simply carrying out what we all wanted to do. We did not think we could get a two-thirds vote and so we tried to break that rule. We could not get the votes to break the two-thirds rule. The only reason we could not was because the delegation from North Carolina ran out and would not stand by us.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The delegation from North Carolina did not run out. It had never run in! [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. That is right, Mr. President, and I beg the Senator's pardon. We could not make them run in. We had them talked to from Hyde Park over the telephone, but that did not do any good either. That is why we could not break the two-thirds rule. We simply could not break it because we did not have the votes. We had talk in our ranks about getting up and walking out of the Chicago convention and running our candidate anyway if we could not get the votes to nominate him there. That talk was in our ranks, and not without some understanding, too.

So before the Chicago convention we placed before Roosevelt the fact of this so-called "bloc", that so-called "element of independence", and what we were fighting for. Were we fighting because of our personal love for Franklin Delano Roosevelt? Were we fighting because we wanted the Democratic emblem above the White House? More than that. We were fighting for no reason on God's earth except that we had the pledged word of our candidate orally and in writing that there must be a spreading of wealth—building the common man up from the bottom and cutting the big man down from the top. We had his promise that the little man should be raised up in the status of wealth and that the big captains of wealth and industry should be pulled down. If anyone doubts that we had that word from the President, it will take no time at all for me to run back through the records I have already produced here. He said it time after time.

We come here today, those of us who have made that fight, those of us who have tried to keep him from going in the direction the consequences of which are what I have had read from the desk. We have tried to turn him away from a policy that leads toward death and destruction. We have tried, Mr. President, to secure the fulfillment and the accomplishment of what was promised to the American people. Those of us who have stood in that way, those of us who could not follow these erring policies, have been singled out and put upon a spot, not of glorification, but that the administration marksmen might see us and shoot at us from various and sundry directions. They gave me my particular part in it.

Let me refer now to the income-tax matters. They gave me my part. I was not up for the first election. We had a little election occurring in New Orleans between the New Orleans ring forces and the Long forces, let us call them. We had a good, high-sounding name, and they had a high-sounding name. Ours was the Louisiana Democratic Association, and theirs was the Regular Democratic Association; but the names of the parties were the "Long party" and the "ring party"—that is all.

The next day after we announced our ticket there came out from Washington, D. C., away across the headlines of the newspapers, eight columns wide:

HUEY P. LONG and 100 friends to be investigated for income taxes. HUEY P. LONG and the main 100 friends he has will be set upon by a horde of income-tax investigators, and all the crew and clique that chased Al Capone down in Chicago are being sent to New Orleans to get HUEY P. LONG.

They did not try to put any covering over this thing. They did not cream it over or put any geraniums beside it. They simply said in their headlines that inasmuch as they had put Al Capone behind the bars, now they had time to come and get HUEY P. LONG and his chief 100 friends. They were all going away. So the hordes were sent down to Louisiana, and they have had about 250 of them down there. They sit around in the offices all day long, and in Sullivan's office all night long. The proceedings of the grand jury are published on the front pages of the newspapers.

When a man is indicted they have already got the news set up in the newspapers, and it is on the streets just about the time they hand the indictment to the judge. Sometimes they have as many as 10 columns of printed matter in the paper. The day before the indictment is handed down the newspaper will say, "So-and-so will be indicted tomorrow morning", and that has gone on for some time, and so many more. They will say, "Witness So-and-so is here to testify and has testified before the grand jury to So-and-so." They say, "We have got 8 men indicted. We are going to indict 100 more."

They go to men who put up money for the Huey Long organization, and they quiz them, and tell them the danger they are in. They go and tell them that they dare not put up another cent, because they have already indicted 8, and they will probably have to indict 800.

That is not all they did. Nobody is afraid of them, either. You can put that down. I have been through this thing before. I have been indicted for everything from stealing a cord of wood up to murder. [Laughter.] There is nothing left to indict me for. [Laughter.] I want to tell you one thing: I am glad it is I they have picked out, Mr. President. There may not be many who can stand it like I can. [Laughter.] When they undertook to impeach me in 1921 for fighting the Standard Oil Co., one old brother came to pray for me, and said, "I sure wish I was in your place." I said, "I am glad you are not, because you would not be there very long."

We went through the impeachment of 1921 and the indictment, and that came out all right. Then we went through 1929 with an indictment and impeachment, and that came out all right. Up to this time they have offered immunity to every man from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico if he would wash away his own sins by simply saying that he did it to help HUEY LONG, so that they might have something to indict me on; and why they have not already done it I do not know. [Laughter.] Every horse thief and crook from Dan to Beersheba has been sought out. Everything I say here is susceptible of proof under oath, gentlemen of the Senate. If any of you think the statements I am making are so wild that the truth of them ought to be shown, you just offer a resolution of investigation and we will go right out and prove them before you get back. We will have the witnesses right up here to prove everything I have said to you. It is not half told. I could not tell it all.

They are not going to have any question about this indictment. They get them up a grand jury to investigate the Long forces. They are very generous about this grand jury. Here is a list of the grand jury.

To begin with, the first thing that we had up here last year was the nomination of a candidate for United States attorney in Louisiana, a gentleman by the name of Réné A. Viosca—V-i-o-s-c-a. That is Dutch spelled Spanish. [Laughter.] Mr. Viosca came up here, and he was accused by me, as the chairman of the subcommittee, of being implicated in a swindle by which the mails were used to defraud innocent investors of $6,000,000 through a fake bridge scheme. When we had produced proof of the matter so conclusive that no man on God's living earth could contradict it we wired Mr. Viosca asking him if he did not want to come before us. Up to that time he had not asked to come at all; so I said to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], "We ought to wire this man if he is not coming of his own accord. If he is not going to ask to appear, we ought to ask him to come before us if he wants to." So we sent him a telegram, and he said he would come any time we wanted him or any time we would receive him; and we wired him to come up, I think, on a Monday morning.

Mr. Viosca went before this subcommittee of which I was the chairman—and I do not give his exact words, but I can almost quote them, I feel certain. He said, when he was finally wound up in this transaction to the point where he could not deny it any longer, "I want to say to you, Senator LONG, that this is a swindle and a fraud, and that I will condemn it in every term you will condemn it in, but that I was not any party to that part of it"; and we twisted him up to where his own name was on the prospectus that went out; and we twisted him up to where he was a stockholder and a bondholder. We put it so close to his eyes that a man 4,000,000 miles away would not have questioned it for an iota of a second; and by unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee—I was the chairman of the subcommittee—we reported unfavorably on this man who was in that swindle, that fraud that went through the mail, together with those other men, all of whom ought long since to have been prosecuted for using the mails to defraud. Not one of them had a defense on God's living face of the earth.

Just to give you one glimpse of the import of that fraud, they put on the prospectus, where a free bridge was to go, that it was a ferry route. There was a law requiring the free bridge to be built, and the money had been raised to build a free bridge that HUEY LONG later built out of New Orleans. There was a law, and the money had been raised, that a free bridge should go over Lake Pontchartrain to the eastern outlet of the Spanish Trail out of New Orleans. They got a hokus-pokus franchise to build a toll bridge right beside it, and sent out to the innocent investors the statement that their only competition was a ferry; and through that kind of a fraud that was sent out through the mails the investors in Illinois, Oregon, New York, Wisconsin, and everywhere else were led to put up $6,000,000 that was swallowed by these grafters. So we went into the United States Senate and produced our proof, and they flew the coop. Not a man on the floor of the Senate, for the administration or anybody else, would lift his voice in favor of Viosca. They did raise their voices for D. D. Moore; but when it came to the case of Viosca there was not a single man from any State who would say, on this floor or off this floor, that Viosca was fit to be United States district attorney.

When the Judiciary Committee reported Viosca unanimously unfavorably the President withdrew his name. Then the Senate adjourned, but by an order of the judge of that court Mr. Viosca was reappointed to serve as district attorney.

Then they got up a grand jury to pass upon HUEY LONG. Whom did they pick for foreman of the grand jury? Lord bless your soul, they picked Arthur C. Waters, the sales manager of the Watson-Williams bridge syndicate that sold the $6,000,000 worth of crooked bonds.

Marvelous situation! They finally decided to clean our plow without ever letting us be heard at all. Political campaigns were coming on, and they had to get some indictments very quickly; and so they picked Arthur C. Waters, of the firm of Waters & Alcus, formerly Woolfork, Waters & Co., sales managers of the bonds of the Watson-Williams toll bridge; and to be sure he did not get loose from them—they wanted to be certain he was tied down by some other tie of protection and contact—so, just as luck would have it, who is Mr. Arthur C. Waters? He is a nephew of Joseph W. Carroll, who is the attorney for the American Sugar Refining Co. and the Standard Oil Co.

Was not that a nice thing to fix it up with? They put this bird Viosca back in there to handle the grand jury, and gave him a foreman who was in on this crooked deal with him and who was a nephew of the lawyer of the Standard Oil interest and of the American Sugar Refining Co.

Another one was Mr. George W. Bernard. Who was he that they picked on this grand jury? Why, he was a partner of the campaign manager of "Turkey-head" Walmsley, the candidate for mayor on the ring ticket. They picked the partner of the campaign manager of the head of the New Orleans ring for another member of the grand jury. [To Senator LEWIS:] "Turkey head" is the name by which Walmsley is generally known down there. It does not mean the kind of turkey the Senator is thinking about. The turkey buzzard represents the type to which I refer. [Laughter.]

The next man was Mr. F. J. De Fuentes. Who is F. J. De Fuentes? Why, he is a factor of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange that we put the tax on for future trading. He makes future sales of cotton. This is the way they make those future cotton sales:

The year that we raised 10,000,000 bales of cotton in this country they sold 60,000,000 bales of cotton in future sales in New Orleans and, I think, about 90,000,000 bales of futures in New York, and thirty or forty million bales in Chicago—future cotton sales. They sold 190,000,000 bales of cotton, and we raised only 10,000,000 bales. They sold 180,000,000 bales of cotton that never saw a cotton patch. Every time, therefore, that they sold one of those bales of so-called "cotton", the exchange was just selling this old farmer's bale of cotton 19 times. Every time they sold it they would take out a broker's commission, and an exchange fee, and a pound and a half as samples, and then they would put the bale back over there, and it would rest a while, and they would bring it out and sell it again and take another exchange fee and a pound and a half of samples and a broker's commission. For every bale of actual cotton that was sold they took out 19 exchange fees and 19 brokers' commissions and 19 samples, and they gave the farmer what was left after they had passed it through certain things, if there was anything left.

We put a little tax on there that they said was going to close down the cotton exchange—2 cents on the hundred dollars. What did we wind up with? We wound up with a man from the cotton exchange on the grand jury, and the next day they indicted my friends down there on income taxes.

All right. I will skip down to another man. This is a pretty good one. They put Mr. Brazer Finley on the grand jury. He had openly signed the call for the mass meeting to mob the legislature that was threatening to put on these taxes. They put him on the grand jury.

Then they put on a man named Lewis G. Hooper. Who was he? Why, he was a relative of the man who had received the approval of Mr. Jim Farley and had been made engineer for the P. W. A.; so they put him on the grand jury, through the appointment of Sullivan.

Then there is Henry T. Howard. Who was he? He was a grandson of the founder of the Louisiana Lottery Co., of which we know something. They put him on the grand jury, a nephew of the Times-Picayune dictator, Alvin P. Howard, and, according to the street rumors—and they tell all that happens before the grand jury down there, print it in the paper—the man Alvin P. Howard who was accused of some income-tax violation. They said, "Here is the case of Alvin P. Howard, who is an uncle of this young man sitting on the grand jury. What about him?" They said, "He has swindled the Government out of $169,000. He sold to a securities company a large amount of stock, and bought it back the next day, in order to beat the income tax." What happened to him? They said they were not after him at all. They were after HUEY LONG. "Dig and dig and dig and dig. Millions and millions and millions to spend to see if there is not some way of indicting and prosecuting HUEY P. LONG, but the $169,000 swindle of Alvin P. Howard—we do not want any indictment of that kind of gentlemen. That is not the purpose of this investigation."

I will go a little further. They had a man by the name of F. Lloyd Monroe. Who was F. Lloyd Monroe? F. Lloyd Monroe was an employee or an officer of the securities company they had charged with this swindle, where they had exchanged this stock.

There were also Bryan O. Reynolds; then Adolph Ricks, a relative of one formerly a ring commissioner there; and Francis G. Sellman. Who was Mr. Sellman? He was related to James L. Sellman, an agent of the United States Internal Revenue Department. Of course, he would be a fair man.

Gail S. Young. Who was he? He was an employee of James Smithers, who was in charge of this fake bridge they had built out there to swindle investors to the extent of $6,000,000 worth of investments.

I have not read all, but that is the kind of ensemble they fixed, and sent 250 men, so I am told, to rake up the bottoms of the earth to try to get something.

Just before election time they made a spread. Here is a sample of their spread:

Long leader accused of tax evasion.

That was a great big eight-column headline. That may affect somebody, but it has never yet affected the voters of the State of Louisiana.

I will give you another little example of what is going on. They indicted a Republican in Louisiana by the name of Lawrence L. Merrigan. He was indicted on the ground that while he was a collector of internal revenue, he allowed employees of that department to contribute to the Republican campaign fund. He has been indicted now for nearly a year or more. Was there anybody else in that condition? Let us see.

Mr. President, Mr. Alvin F. Fix, late collector of internal revenue of the Philadelphia (Pa.) district, and another national committeeman, or some man about like him, were suspended. I have the paper here, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and the headline is:

Fix and five aides are suspended in election macing; Federal men hit by order of Roosevelt; Internal Revenue Collector P. J. Reilly, Henry L. Haines, John J. Gegan, Robert M. Black, and William E. Brown all relieved of duties by Morgenthau.

The headlines continue:

Action follows hearing in Treasury office; criminal prosecution likely if allegations are sustained; charged with blackjacking to aid in the Democratic campaign.

They sustained the charges, I understand, that these men were found to have been collecting money from employees in the Department of Internal Revenue, but they have never yet indicted or prosecuted Alvin F. Fix, and my understanding is that he probably will not be.

Lo and behold, it happened that there was a little fellow by the name of Lawrence F. Merrigan down in Louisiana who had been accused of the same thing. He had been put out of office for a long time, and they went back and dug up something that was supposed to have happened nearly 2 years before that time in order to indict this little man by the name of Lawrence F. Merrigan. Why did they go after Lawrence F. Merrigan? I will tell you why. Lawrence F. Merrigan wrote a letter to the Department of Internal Revenue, to Guy T. Helvering, which I read before the Senate. Lawrence Merrigan did not give me that letter which he wrote, but I got hold of it in a way that some day I may have to tell. Lawrence Merrigan wrote a letter to Mr. Guy T. Helvering at a time when he was serving as internal-revenue collector in Louisiana, and he told them that they had sent hundreds and hundreds of men down there instructing him that he had to do something to help get something on HUEY P. LONG. He told them in this letter that I had been investigated for 1928 and 1929 and 1930 and 1931; he told them that they had had hundreds and hundres of men, an he said, "I have not been able to find anything to indict him on or present any charge against him on, and I ask you to give me instructions whose orders I must take. Must I take the written orders coming out of Washington, or must I take these orders which come to me by word of mouth from this flock of internal-revenue agents who are coming down to the State of Louisiana?"

What did they do with this man? They summoned a grand jury and indicted him within a short time after I made public that letter. The only reason on God's earth why they ever indicted that man, Lawrence Merrigan, was the fact that I had offered that letter here on the floor of the Senate and they thought Merrigan had given it out.

Did they act as if they were going to clean up the Augean stables? No. We were told on the 30th day of May 1934 in glaring headlines that the blackjacking of employees had been going on, and up until this time there has been no such thing as a semblance of a prosecution, and Merrigan has never been able to get his case tried.

Mr. President, public life is not so dear to me, public life does not mean so much to me, that I will endorse such practices in order to share in a little Federal patronage. If, in order that I may be recognized in the dispensation of a few little plums and doles in my State, I must bend my knees to that kind of illegal crookedness and favoritism; if I have to join a policy which leads irresistibly and irretrievably to the wreckage and ruin of the masses of the country; if I, remembering the midnight oil I have burned in acquiring the little learning I have managed to secure; if, after the perusal I have made of the lights of ancient and medieval and modern times and all of the crusading I have done in politics, must kneel to such crooks as may be employed by men like Jim Farley—God send me to hell before I bring myself to go through that kind of thing in order to get patronage.

There may be Democrats here who will bend their knees and truckle their souls and their consciences to that kind of a crook and demon, who goes into the red-light districts, into the dives of demons and dens of hell, in order that they might have favoritism with the heads of the party; but I do not want recognition from the heads of the party that bad.

I am the head of the Democratic Party in Louisiana by choice of the people of that State. I was elected national Democratic committeeman. I was elected United States Senator. I was elected Governor, and the other day I was elected chairman of the Democratic State central committee. So far as the Democratic Party amounts to anything in Louisiana, I do not know of anything more I could get to show that I enjoy the confidence of the Democrats of the State of Louisiana than I have received at the hands of the people of that State. But if Democratic recognition must come from such affiliation, if any dispensation of patronage has to come in that way, then I can afford to let the party settle to such levels as will allow me to maintain my own self-respect and follow the policies desired by the people of my State.

Just one more word or two, and I shall be through. I see that there has been a probe of the munitions makers. Old Baruch came back again. God bless old Barney! He will never leave. He has been here with every President, and has helped to ruin them all. He was the guiding counsellor when they sent Hoover to the demnition bowwows. He was here when Wilson made his last licks, and he has been here with Roosevelt ever since we put him in. It was old Baruch, as I look at my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who sits so silent and says nothing—it was old Baruch that led me to warn that I did not want to support Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. When I reached the Senate I did not want to support him. I said he would not do.

I was a country boy, raised in the pine hills of Winn Parish, and I had been taught to beware of the men who were smarter than I was. Away back in early life my grandfather had some cotton that had to be picked, and it was getting close to frost time and the rainy season. If the rain and the frost hit the cotton, there would be no more cotton picked, and we would lose the crop. So he sent out a call for cotton pickers and they came in.

One man came in and picked 450 pounds of cotton the first day. That was about three times as much as an ordinary cotton picker can pick. They were paying these men 50 cents a hundred and board. Naturally a man who picked 450 pounds of cotton not only helped get out the cotton crop but he saved the board of two extra men.

When this man picked 450 pounds of cotton, my grandfather fired him that night. Why? He said, "I don't keep anybody around here smarter than I am. I will be working for him if I do." And he let him go. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there were entirely too many words being used by those candidates during those days to try to find out what they meant. They were spending entirely too many words in trying to find out what they did mean. So I was somewhat suspicious of all of them.

One day I was in New York, and I telephoned my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who now sits in this body, that he was supposed to come to New York that day, and I wanted to discuss with him the candidacy of the President, to tell him that I believed I had information enough to convince him that we ought to go somewhere else for a candidate. It was the Senator from Montana who declined to come to New York, and notified me he was on his way to Hyde Park.

Some short time later I had what I considered the guidance of the masterful intellect of the Senator from Nebraska, on the Republican side of the fence, and the Senator from Montana on the Democratic side of the fence. I loaded on the Roosevelt bandwagon, boots, saddle, and all, and when I load, I go the whole way. I am very much like our old leader was on the question of free silver. One of his friends went to him and said, "What do you want me to be, for gold or silver?" He said, "Leave me your pamphlets here, and I will look them over, and I will tell you which way to go." He went back to see him a week later, and he said, "I cannot make up my mind. The arguments on one side are just about as good as the arguments on the other. Come back next Monday, and I will tell you." He went back on the next Monday, and he said, "I still cannot make up my mind. It seems like the gold has the better of it until I read about silver, and then it seems that the silver has the better of it until I read about gold. Come back here Wednesday, and I will be able to tell you which side I will go on, and whichever side I take, I sure am going to be bitter, when I do decide where I am about this matter."

Well, when I finally found out I was on the Roosevelt side I was bitter about the proposition, and I went on the Roosevelt side of the campaign. When I sat back at my ease in my contented den in Louisiana with the clouds rolling by in these other States; when I sat there in that lurid atmosphere of peace and quiet and good will among men, and thought of my friend from Nebraska, I wondered how he felt when Jim Farley sent his horde out to New Mexico to yank out another man who followed his teaching like I did and went for Roosevelt. I wondered how my friend, the Honorable GEORGE W. NORRIS, felt. I wondered if he felt like he could walk out among his constituents and hold his head up when all the pack had gathered for the chase to throw BRONSON CUTTING out of the United States Senate—who had followed along and left his party in order to see the present occupant go to the White House.

Why, it was enough, Mr. President, so that none of us would ever again feel like getting into any politics. None of the trials and fights that I have ever faced ever held a candle to that spectacle.

Why, Mr. President, after I had raised money and sent it to New York on days when they told me they would not be able to pay the stenographers in some of the little offices if money did not come in, and when I went out and raised the money and sent it to them—it is bad enough to see the men who gave that money hounded in the city of New Orleans and Louisiana by revenue collectors undertaking to indict them because they had been friends to me in that time when Roosevelt was crying for money—I say that was bad, but I never saw a thing in my life like this other spectacle. When I thought of my friends being thus hounded, I could console myself and feel comforted. It was as a song to quiet a troubled soul compared to the spectacle I could look at where they had gone thousands of miles to New Mexico to chase out of the United States Senate the man who had left his party for the sake of humanity in order to help us in that election of 1932.

I cannot be in with that line of policy. If that is necessary in order to get the patronage of the Democratic Party in Louisiana, then count me out.

I cannot follow that line of policy. I cannot check in on that line of reasoning. I have never yet been taught that line by which you allow your friend to pull you as far up the hill as he can and then stab him in the back so that you can put somebody else in his place. I have never been taught that that is an act of gratitude to humanity. I have never been taught that that is an act of sound public politics or of sound government. So I cannot check in on that line. And I will not be found in that kind of politics.

Well, now, old Barney Baruch comes back. Bless your soul, old Barney appears on the scene just in time. There are some people who think that Barney comes when he should not come, but that is wrong. He comes when he should come. Down in Bolivia they have a whole lot of tinplate. In fact, they have so much tinplate down there that the English Government tries to keep it from coming out because it destroys the market for the tinware. Now, Mr. Baruch appeared here the other day before the United States Senate and gave a little testimony. What was his testimony? He swore—or rather he said—I did not hear him; I just read it in the newspapers, and that is the only way I have to get the news these days—he said that the United States Government ought to stock up on tinware immediately; that we ought to buy all the tinplate we could right now. Why? Well, Bolivia is in a war for the Standard Oil Co. against Paraguay down there in South America. The Standard Oil Co. wanted to take some possessions that had been awarded by the President of the United States in the treaty in the arranging of which he had acted as a negotiator and as a mediator. The President had awarded the Chaco district to Paraguay; so now, in order that they get this property for the Standard Oil Co. that had been officially decided to belong to Paraguay by Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, they finance Bolivia down there to bring a war on Paraguay to capture this oil territory in the very Chaco district that had previously been awarded to Paraguay.

Well, Bolivia, I understand, owes the United States $68,000,000; and they have defaulted on their loan. The Standard Oil Co. has put up about all the money they want to right now, and the battles are not going very well. Under the Johnson bill, which was adopted here in the United States Senate and also was adopted by the House of Representatives, which prevents the United States lending any money to a foreign country which is in default on obligations, Bolivia cannot borrow any more money. So along comes Mr. Barney Baruch—and God save him for us for future generations to come. I hope that man is here for some years to come so as to show people just what they have got to go up against in future times compared with what we have had to contend with, poor simpletons, in the present day—along comes Barney Baruch and says that America ought to buy up immense stores of tinware and tinplate.

That is about the same thing as saying that America ought to go down to Bolivia and give enough money out of the Treasury of the United States for Bolivia to keep up this war against Paraguay, because the United States cannot lend Bolivia any more money now that the Johnson bill has passed, because Bolivia is in default on $68,000,000 which that country already has borrowed.

Now, if that were the only thing to stand out you might disbelieve me. But it is not. The Senator from Nevada presented a bill here to the United States Senate in the last Congress in which he asked that we pass a law forbidding exportation of munitions to either Bolivia or Paraguay. He said that there was immediate necessity for such action. I had the floor that day, I think, when he rose and asked to be recognized, and he asked that I yield the floor in order that this bill might have immediate action and immediate passage, and without reading his actual remarks I can state to the Senate the substance of them, and they were that we should immediately pass the bill because we ought to stop these munitions from being exported to these two countries immediately.

Well, we passed the bill immediately. Did it stop the export in arms? If it did, the Standard Oil Co. did not know it. They said that they had already contracted to buy some munitions in this country, and they called upon the Department of Justice for a ruling as to whether or not the law forbids them from exporting what they had already bought and contracted to buy, and the Attorney General's office ruled that that was a matter for the courts to decide; that he did not know; and, therefore, they said, "Well, we already had a lot bought from Tom Smith and Jones & Co."; and when that ran out they had some more bought; and, therefore, they have been exporting arms and munitions to Bolivia ever since we enacted that law, notwithstanding the fact that we did it in all the haste and hurry on the ground that we were going to stop the war in which Bolivia is trying to take away what the United States President said already belongs to Paraguay.

So that is the condition and that is the policy, and we are called upon to endorse that policy or else we are called upon to be excommunicated from the patronage that belongs to a State.

I have been unable to go along the line of that policy. I have predicted what that means, and I so believed it at the time it was begun.

Now, I believe, Mr. President, that I will not proceed farther, except to say one word in defense of our debt-moratorium law. We enacted a law in Louisiana after we waited for relief—a debt-moratorium law to suspend the payment of debts that people are not able to pay. I have letters in my hand showing the approval of that law by everyone. I look for that law to become a national law. I intend to offer such a bill in this Congress.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, unless there is something further to come before the Senate, I shall move an adjournment until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next, in order to give the committees an opportunity to transact business.

I now move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, January 10, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1935

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 3, 1935)

The recess having expired, the House (at 12 o'clock noon) was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 10

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Henry T. Rainey, late Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday next.

Senate Resolution 11

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Frederick Landis, late a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday next.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. VANDENBERG members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive department", for the disposition of useless papers in the Government Printing Office.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL] is present and wishes to take the oath of office.

Mr. MARSHALL appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds a letter of resignation of the Honorable Frank Oliver, of New York, which was addressed to the late Speaker of the House last June. The letter came after Congress adjourned. I think it proper that it should be read from the desk and printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUNE 21, 1934.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

I have the honor to inform you by this letter that at midnight June 18, 1934, I accepted the office of magistrate of the city of New York and duly sent my resignation to the proper officials, to wit, the secretary of state and the Governor.

Faithfully,

FRANK OLIVER.

THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read.

(For message see Senate proceedings, p. 141, of this day.)

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS—LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 32

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittees thereof be authorized to sit during sessions and recesses of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute in order to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced and placed in the basket a bill making it a serious offense for anyone to advocate the overthrow of this Government by force and violence. It is an exact copy of the bill which in a former Congress was introduced by our colleague, now deceased, Mr. Eslick, of Tennessee, and but for his untimely death, would have been passed.

In such connection I want to call attention to the patriotic and magnificent radio address made last Saturday by William Randolph Hearst and published in yesterday's Washington Herald, entitled "Government by the Proletariat."

We have no proletariat in the United States, because all citizens here have equal rights under the law, and the poorest and least consequential of today may be the richest and most powerful of tomorrow.

This address of Mr. Hearst is most timely. I wish that it could be read to every boy and girl in every school in the land. They would better appreciate our own Constitution and Government. It is so very important and contains so many significant facts regarding the enslaving of the people of Russia by the so-called "proletariat" government, that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating this Hearst address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the address, as it appeared in the Washington Herald, January 6, 1935:

GOVERNMENT BY THE PROLETARIAT

A radio address by William Randolph Hearst

I have to thank that great Nation-wide network, the National Broadcasting Co., and its distinguished president, Mr. M. H. Aylesworth, for the opportunity afforded me of addressing their vast audience.

The proletariat, as the dictionary defines it, was the lowest order of citizenship in Rome.

This class was without property of any kind, and without the constructive or executive ability to acquire any.

In Russia, during the disorder which followed the World War, this class obtained, by force and violence, complete control of the powers of government.

Is this class, which is the least able successfully to manage its own affairs, the best able to manage the affairs of a nation?

The promised proletarian utopia in Russia should offer evidence.

It does. And, apparently, all is not well in utopia.

Despite the assurances of the Russian Soviet, there are evidences of rising revolution against the new regime.

One high official of the Government has been assassinated by the revolutionists.

One hundred and seventeen so-called "conspirators" have been executed for protest against what they call "a government of cruelty and incompetence."

Five people have been shot for stealing bread in Moscow, and 17 have been sent to prison or to Siberia for the same offense.

Two thousand peasant farmers were slaughtered in one day by the Red Army, and many more thousands, driven from their homes, fled into Afghanistan.

What was the crime of these farmers?

It would not be a crime in a contemptible capitalist country like ours.

They merely tried to save from the rapacious Red Army enough of their own grain to preserve themselves from starvation.

So the Red Army shot them down with machine guns and blew them to pieces with bombs from the air.

And as a climax of class cruelty, the firing squads of the Red Army lined 14 mayors, or head men, of peasant villages up against the wall and shot them to death in the name of order, discipline, and obedience.

Thus, you see, my friends, there is assassination in Russia.

There is the rumbling of revolution.

There is wholesale execution of political opponents.

And there is starvation.

An utopia without food is not so satisfying to the plundered or even to the plunderers.

And Russia is starving now and has been starving.

If you do not believe it, read the statement of Dr. Edwalde Ammende, in the New York Times, as long ago as August 4th of last year.

Dr. Ammende is a figure of importance.

He speaks with authority.

He is chairman of the International Committee for the Relief of Soviet Russia.

He said that, "In 1933 millions of people died in the Soviet Union because relief was not forthcoming in due time."

Dr. Ammende displayed photographs, issued officially, depicting the bodies of starved peasants lying in gutters and along sidewalks.

"Last year", said Dr. Ammende, "it was admitted that the grain crop was fair.

"Even then it is estimated that between 5,000,000 and 10,000,000 people died of starvation.

"This fall and winter", continued Dr. Ammende, "it will be at least as bad."

This means that 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 more peasants will die of starvation.

And all this is happening in proletarian utopia.

All these calamitous conditions exist as a direct consequence of this "noble experiment" of communism, this optimistic adventure in government by the least executive element of the community, this so-called "idealistic", but actually sadistic, proletarian despotism, which some lunatics in our country desire us to imitate.

Furthermore, all this suffering, starvation, and wholesale death is occurring in the midst of comparative plenty.

Peter Khrisanfov, attaché of the Washington Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, said recently:

"In spite of the drought in some sections the harvest (of 1934) is expected to compare favorably with the bumper crop of 1933."

Apparently, then, 1933 had a bumper crop, and still 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 peasants starved to death.

"The harvest (of 1934) is expected to compare favorably with the bumper crop of 1933", and still 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 peasants are expected to starve to death in 1934.

How is this possible?

Mr. Kossior, well-known member of the Moscow Politbureau, gives an inkling of the explanation in a statement before the plenum of the executive committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Ukraine.

"We know by experience", stated Mr. Kossior, as reported in the official organ of the Soviet Government, the Izvestia, "that the question is not only how large the crop is, but how much grain we shall succeed in collecting."

"That", says Mr. Kossior, "is decisive. And how much we collect depends on us."

Dr. Ammende also explains.

Says Dr. Ammende:

"All available forces are now mobilized with the object of depriving the producer of his grain strictly according to the plan drawn up by the Kremlin months ago.

"The very existence of the population of the industrial districts, the feeding of the populations of the big towns, of the members of the Communist Party of the Red Army, as well as the maintenance of the grain export—the chief source of the Soviet Government for getting much-needed foreign exchange—depends entirely upon the success of the harvest campaign"—which means, my friends, the campaign of spoliation.

By what method is this grain ravished from the Russian peasants, while they are left to starve?

Harold Denny, Russian correspondent of the New York Times, declares that there is going on in connection with this year's campaign of spoliation a struggle "of a nature and intensity probably never before seen in the world."

He further remarks that this harvesting campaign is being carried through by the Soviet authorities "like a military offensive."

Dr. Ammende declares in support of these statements that the tragic import "is that the individual peasants, after they have delivered the grain, will not keep sufficient to guarantee their existence until the coming winter."

There is the answer.

That is the reason why 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 Russian farmers die of starvation each year.

They die so that communism and the Communists may be supported, so that the Red Army may be maintained, so that the tyranny of the proletariat—the rule of the least capable, the least successful and the least humanitarian element of the community—may be continued.

And who is expected to maintain the iron despotism of the proletariat?

Who is expected to continue the murderous oppression by the blood Red Army?

Who is expected to see to it that Russia gets the "much-needed foreign exchange" to keep her hideous tyranny, her monstrous and monumental governmental failure going?

Why, of course, we citizens of America; we despised American bourgeois, we American farmers—brothers of the skeletons on the Russian sidewalks and in the gutters; we foul and filthy American capitalists; we misguided and mistaken supporters of a free republic.

We stupid and ignorant believers in liberty and democracy—we are supposed to contribute to the maintenance of the most brutal and bloody despotism that ever disgraced and defiled God's earth.

More people dead by famine in Russia in 2 years than died in the whole 5 years' slaughter of the World War, and we are supposed to come to the rescue of the Kremlin, this charnel house built of bones and cemented with innocent blood.

We are supposed to rescue this vile and vicious system of robbery and murder, so that these Communists can, in turn, proselyte in our country to the end that we be robbed and murdered also.

We, to our own undoing, are supposed to save the Soviets from the righteous resentment of their own oppressed people.

How are we going to save the Soviets?

Dr. Ammende points the way.

We must come to their aid with our grain surpluses.

"Economists", says Dr. Ammende, "have been wondering how to dispose of these surpluses which contribute to the distress of your own agriculturists, and this seems to be a logical reply."

Dr. Ammende then declared that the most tragic feature of the 1933 famine was the fact that while "millions of human beings were dying of hunger in the Ukraine" and other sections of the country, some 70,000,000 bushels of grain (68,893,323 bushels to be exact) were exported by the Soviets to acquire foreign money.

"There is no doubt whatever", said Dr. Ammende, "that the grain which was exported would have saved the lives of a few million human beings."

"Just a few million", says Dr. Ammende lightly; but continues he sadly:

"Their lives were not saved.

"It is for me", says Dr. Ammende, "a great satisfaction to note that the leaders of the churches and the religious organizations in the United States shared the opinion that the question of relief for the starving people of the Soviet Union must be dealt with independently of the political considerations as a purely humanitarian problem."

How can we regard the question "independently of the political considerations"?

How can we give aid and comfort to a gang of criminal Communists who are robbing and murdering harmless farmers "to acquire foreign money" in order to support the government of the proletariat, and to maintain the Red Army, which keeps the proletariat in power?

No wonder Lenin said:

"The dictatorship of the proletariat is nothing else than power based upon force and limited by nothing—by no kind of law and by absolutely no rule."

No wonder the Congress of the Komintern, or the Communist Internationale, declared:

"The conquest of power by the proletariat is the violent abolition of the power of the bourgeoisie, the destruction of the machinery of the capitalist state.

"We proclaim openly that our design can only be realized by the violent overthrow of the entire traditional social order."

And then comes Stalin, in a public address to American Communists, and says:

"The American Communist Party must be improved and bolshevized.

"For that end we must work in order to forge real revolutionary cadres and a real revolutionary leadership of the proletariat, capable of leading the many millions of the American working class toward the revolutionary class struggles."

Well, citizens of free America, do we want the cruel class rule of the incompetent proletariat in our country?

Do we want a dictatorship based upon force and limited by no kind of law and absolutely no rule?

Do we want to see the violent overthrow of the entire traditional social order?

Do any genuinely American workers want to see the American working class led toward revolutionary class struggles?

Do our farmers want to be starved to death to support a Red Army, a blood-stained army which will murder them?

Do our competent business men, who have built the wealth of this Nation, want to be plundered and driven out of business by a thriftless and shiftless crew of organized incompetents?

Do our orderly political leaders want to be replaced by a revolutionary band of ruthless assassins?

Does anybody want the bloody despotism of communism in our free America except a few incurable malcontents, a few sap-headed college boys, and a few unbalanced college professors who teach the young and inexperienced that the robbery and rapine of communism is—God save the mark—ideology?

Of course, the Soviets will say that Mr. Harold Denny, Russian correspondent of the New York Times, lies; that Dr. Ewalde Ammende, honorary secretary of the International Aid Committee for the Starvation Districts of Soviet Russia, lies; that Cardinal Innitzer, who is president of the committee, lies; that Dr. Ammende's official photographs lie; that the Izvestia, official organ of the Soviet Government, lies; that Mr. Kossior, well-known member of the Moscow Politbureau, lies; that everybody lies; that there is no famine in Russia, no oppression in Russia, no murder in Russia; that there is nothing in Russia but peace and prosperity and harmony and contentment—nothing but brotherly love and tender solicitude for the welfare of all.

But in spite of the utter lack of liberty in Russia, in spite of the total suppression of free speech, in spite of the utter abolition of free publication, in spite of military censorship, in spite of universal terrorism—the truth is slowly leaking out of Russia.

And the truth is that revolution is rife, starvation stalks starkly across the land, executions are commonplaces, murder a routine of government; and that the national colors of communism are daily dipped in the blood of subject classes to keep them bright.

The truth is that government by the proletariat, government by the least capable and the least conscientious element of the community, government by the mob, government by ignorance and avarice, government by tyranny and terrorism, despotism "limited by nothing, by no kind of law, and by absolutely no rule" is the fearful failure that it needs must be and definitely deserves to be.

I thought, my friends, that you might like to know the plain, uncensored truth.

I am glad that this free country of ours permits me to tell it to you.

STABILIZATION OF THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by my able and distinguished colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] over WFA, at Dallas, Tex., December 27, 1934, on the subject of money.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by my colleague, Hon. O. H. CROSS, over the radio on December 27, 1934:

It is evident that there is something radically wrong with our financial machinery when in a land of plenty, in the midst of an abundance to amply feed and clothe all of our people, millions are hungry and cold, and plead, and have for 5 long years been pleading, for work that they might earn the wherewithal to feed and clothe their families, but they plead in vain; while other millions shackled with hopeless debt, their life's savings doomed to be wiped out, are suffering mental tortures with which no physical slavery can compare, many of the weaker of whom in desperation are being driven to crime and suicide. And all this as the result of our unjust and vicious monetary system.

The monetary system of a country is to its economic welfare what the circulation of the blood is to the body. The gold in the gold dollar has but little intrinsic value, and as such means little, but its purchasing power resulting from the statutory fiat making it legal tender for all debts means much. We cannot hope to have sustained prosperity with our monetary unit, the dollar, uncontrolled and at intervals running amuck, expanding and contracting in purchasing power. Our monetary metal, gold, like every other commodity, fluctuates in value in response to the law of supply and demand; and as the statutory debt-paying medium, that fluctuation is accentuated by fear and hoarding. The effect of supply and demand on the purchasing power of our unstabilized gold dollar was vividly demonstrated as a result of the World War. During that war 42 countries in Europe ceased to use gold as money; and as we continued to use it as money, it flooded here until we had practically half the gold available for monetary purposes in all the world, and, under the law of supply and demand, gold cheapened until the gold dollar had but small purchasing power, and as its purchasing power declined, the prices of property in the same ratio went up.

The working of our present unstabilized gold-dollar system can be aptly illustrated by two buckets attached to the two ends of a chain which passes over a pulley as in a well, and as one bucket goes up the other bucket goes down. Let one of these buckets represent the commodity gold—that is, the gold dollar—and the other bucket represent all property, buildings, homes, all products and commodities that supply the necessities and comforts of the people, as well as the lands that produce them. Now, as the purchasing power of the unstabilized gold dollar decreased during and for several years after the World War, the bucket representing the commodity gold—that is, the gold dollar—went down in price or purchasing power, and the price of all things in the property bucket in the same ratio of necessity went up, until we saw cotton sell for 42 cents a pound, cottonseed $80 a ton, and mostly any kind of a steer, in excess of a hundred dollars, and other things in proportion. Some years after the World War, when the 42 countries that had abandoned gold as money attempted to return to the use of gold as money, the demand for it became great, and as a result its purchasing power shot up, which is the same thing as saying that the price of all property represented by the property bucket of necessity plunged down. So those who had gone into debt during this period of high prices or cheap dollars and mortgaged their homes, farms, and ranches, and the cities and towns, the school and road districts that had voted bonds and exchanged them for 30-cent purchasing-power dollars, compared with the present high purchasing power of the dollar, are now being called upon to pay three and four times in real value what they received.

Our monetary unit, the dollar, uncontrolled as it is in purchasing power, is in no sense a measure of value. Properly stabilized in purchasing power, it would be a measure of value, as the lineal foot is a measure of length, or the pound is a measure of weight, or the cubic foot is a unit measure of volume. You can no more measure volume by a unit of weight, such as the pound, than you can measure value by the gold dollar, which is the fixed unit of weight. Before the dollar can be used as a unit to measure value, it must be stabilized in purchasing power by taking the mean or average price of a large number of commodities which supply the necessities and comforts of the people over any normally prosperous period, such as the year 1926, which average price is termed the "wholesale commodity price level." This means that while the price of various commodities may go up and down in response to supply and demand, yet when you take the price of the whole number of commodities used in determining the purchasing power of the dollar, its purchasing power must be kept in harmony with the wholesale commodity price level of that year which is taken as a standard. So that if one borrowed a thousand dollars, he will pay back when it falls due, whether it be 1 or 20 years later, a thousand dollars having the same purchasing power as the thousand dollars he borrowed.

Under the mechanics of the bill which I shall introduce to bring about this result there is to be a currency stabilization board consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Labor, and the Comptroller of the Currency, empowered, when they find the purchasing power of the dollar greater than its purchasing power during the year 1926, which is known as the "standard year", gradually and uniformly to reduce income taxes and to continue to pay by issuing legal-tender stabilization certificates, all governmental expenses, as well as all Federal bonds as they fall due, until the average price level of commodities returns to that of 1926. And should prices rise until the wholesale commodity price level, as determined by the various products used for the purpose, exceeds by 2 percent the wholesale commodity price level of 1926, to uniformly increase the income-tax rate and withdraw currency from circulation until the wholesale commodity price level returns to that of 1926.

Consumption is in proportion to employment and adequate wages; and when such conditions prevail as prevailed under the wholesale commodity price level of 1926, products can be sold for a profit, and then and not until then will demand keep pace with production and our imaginary nightmare of surpluses vanish. Under such conditions our standard of living will be raised and want and crime will become rare, and panics things of the past.

Under the workings of this bill fair prices will be assured, and fair prices mean profits, and under such conditions an increase in income taxes is easily borne. There are in excess of $27,000,000,000 of Federal bonds outstanding which would gradually be paid off and an end brought to the necessity of the Federal Government's issuing bonds and longer lending its credit to private corporations that they might use that credit to tax the people to their profit.

The things that feed and clothe the people and supply their necessities and comforts are just as valuable today as they were ten or a hundred years ago, and will continue to be so ten or a hundred years hence. It is the unstabilized, fluctuating purchasing power of our monetary unit, the dollar, which is in no sense a measure of value that is constantly perpetrating mass injustice. Stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar on the wholesale commodity price level as shown by the average or mean price of the 784 commodities used by the Labor Bureau in Washington covering any normally prosperous period, and then and not until then will we have a true measure of value and exact justice done to both debtor and creditor.

WAR OR PEACE

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the able speech to be delivered by the former secretary of President Wilson, Mr. Tumulty, on Peace or War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this evening Hon. Joseph P. Tumulty, who was the Secretary of the great war President, Woodrow Wilson, will deliver a very beautiful and able address before the Women's Democratic Club of this city. Mr. Tumulty's address, entitled "War or Peace", is as follows:

WAR OR PEACE

As one who stood by the side of a great war President, I am often asked the question, What are your reactions to the threats of war, which like ominous clouds brood over the peace of the world? Will these dark clouds ever pass away? Shall we again permit war to catch us off guard, dragging all of humanity down into a maelstrom of blood and tears?

Are the forces of fear and hate again to be triumphant or shall faith and a love of humanity in the processes of peace gain such a sway that the sober second thought of the people will intervene and save us from a calamity that will bring us to barbarism with its sordidness of tragedy and sorrow? Are we helpless? Shall the cold formalism of a House resolution declaring war be considered a mere matter of routine? Shall we humbly bow our heads and submit to this horrible yoke without vehement protest?

I believe that down in the hearts and souls of the men and children of the world there is an abhorrence of this miserable thing called "war." War, death's holiday, is a futility. It does not permanently settle anything and leaves behind as an aftermath the delicate tinder of bitterness and hatred that can easily be swept into a world conflagration, killing and destroying all that is fine in human nature.

In my reading I ran across a most interesting article in the magazine section of the New York Times, in its issue of December 2, 1934, headlined as follows: "A Force for Peace is the People's Will", by a writer named Libby Benedict. This story was written from Berlin. Certain excerpts run as follows: "This year the people are recalling events of 20 years ago, when the country trembled under the impact of war. For there have been political assassinations; a chancellor, a king, and a foreign minister have been slain. But the crisis passed. There was no outbreak. Where lay the deciding weight? From which direction came the determining force?" Some say the delicate manipulation of diplomacy kept things steady. Then the writer says, "But still the impetus toward peace did not lie there. It lay without, in the streets of the cities and the woods of the countryside." And continuing, she says, "Even in Germany there is still no assurance that, given the order to fire, the volleys might not sometime be directed against those who gave the order. There is still a controlling force everywhere—the uncertainty as to what these seemingly inchoate masses might do once the guns have been put into their hands. And to all this another element has been added. Although the people have been thinking with horror of a war that might be a duplicate of the last one, the governmental heads know that a future conflict would not be a repetition. The next war would be fought on new fronts, or on no fronts at all. Diabolical advance has been made in scientific methods of human extermination. Trenches and tanks would be only the symbols of battle; the actual destruction would come creeping invisibly out of the streets, pelted down in drops of rain. It is a picture too fearful even for those who may still find it possible to move human beings like chessmen. In a sense the people are responsible for this development also. For it is from the people that the laboratory technicians have come."

In the olden days, with its drama, its courage and heroism, its dashing music, the beat, beat, beat of the drum, its waving banners, war gave one a thrill; but to use an apt phrase of Bob Acres, "the valor has oozed out of it," with its bombs dropping from the air, its submarine warfare, its poisonous gases, and disease germs, destroying helpless men, women, and children. If this be modern chivalry, then it is the chivalry of barbarism.

We are told by the headlines that the statesmanship of halting old men will bring forth this spawn of war as the means of adjusting international disputes. Have we learned nothing by the bitter lessons of the past? Are we to return to the Dark Gods—the Juggernauts again? Are we again like innocent ducklings to be swept into the vortex of war, forgetting the example of the Gadarene swine, who went down a steep place and were united as one pig—the devil fear uniting them?

Only bold and enlightened statesmanship can save us from another calamity. In these days one is cried down if he dares to flaunt war. Napoleon in the loneliness of St. Helena said, "War is the business of barbarism." "There was never a good war or a bad peace," said Ben Franklin. William Robertson, a great wartime chief of England, characterized war as "a fool's game."

Do not delude yourselves that the wars of the future will be child's play. Its energies will not be directed wholly toward the men in the field and in the trenches. From the air will be poured exterminating fire and suffocating gases, using as a target the bodies of men, women, and children. Nothing can make war anything but what it really is—a bleeding, horrible thing that is thrice accursed. Poets and dramatists have hurled their pointed, poisonous arrows of scorn and ridicule upon it, denouncing it as a cruel, un-Christian, inhuman, and unwholesome thing. Even Shelley, the great poet's "chaste moon, which makes all things beautiful upon which it smiles", cannot make it beautiful. Indeed, the beams of Shelley's moon but makes its horrors more full of horrors still.

No; not even a Shakespeare or a Dickens could make modern warfare a thing of beauty. Douglas Jerrold said, "Dress it as you may, feather it, daub it with gold, hug it, and sing swaggering songs about it—what is war? Nine times out of ten it is but murder in uniform."

War is an anachronism. It is a move backward to tragedy, sorrow, and broken hearts. It is the road down, down to utter hopelessness and despair. It is the open road to moral and financial bankruptcy. How foolish we are to believe that real stability and prosperity can be accomplished without peace. We try this and experiment with that, endeavoring to find a way out of the wilderness, but always we stand in the shadow of that stark wall of tragedy—war. The cynical-minded statesman shrugs his shoulders and declares that butchery and murder will always be the model and mode of settling controversial questions. The recent trip of an airplane traveling from England to Australia in 72 hours sounded the death knell and chanted the hymn of hate against isolation; and with the highways of the stratosphere open, imaginary political frontiers and natural boundaries like seas and rugged mountains will be as houses made of cardboard. In these circumstances we must learn to live together. Just as individuals accept law as an arbiter of peace, so civilized nations will be compelled to do the same.

To all appeals made for peace, we are told wars, like disease and death, are inevitable. It is a biological necessity. This, I beg leave to say, is the cry of despairing statesmanship. It is the direful lamentation of the same type of mind who thought the world was flat and that witch burning was a noble experiment. It is the wail of the cynic, the last resort of the Gradgrindian philosopher, who foolishly believes all life consists of facts, facts, facts.

We speak of helping human society—we strive by divers routes to organize it—and yet we leave wholly untouched this cancer of war that is eating at the vitals of the world, making every approach to the solution of greater problems impossible. This is not my statement. It is the statement of a great dreamer of beautiful dreams, one who in a knightly day left the cloistered retreat of a great university to become the helmsman of our Ship of State. It is the statement of a man who in his day suffered, struggled, sacrificed, and sorrowed to build a great edifice of peace. I refer to that man, who, like Christ, held high in his hand the torch of peace to warm a sadly distraught world. I refer to Woodrow Wilson, whose far-flung vision was twisted and tortured by politicians to win an election. Yes; they won an election at the price of the world's peace.

In 1920, we witnessed the crucifixion of Wilson's ideal of peace, but soon in the providence of God we will behold its resurrection. What did Wilson say was the right way to organize industrial peace? In a speech delivered in California, in 1919, he said: "There is another battle of which we are now upon the eve. That is the battle for the right organization of industrial society. I do not need to tell an audience in this great progressive State what I mean by that. We cannot work out justice in our communities if the world is to continue under arms and ready for war. We must have peace, we must have leisure of mind and detachment of purpose if we are going to work out the great reforms for which mankind is everywhere waiting. I pray God that normal times may not much longer be withheld from us. The world is profoundly stirred. The masses of men are stirred by thoughts which never moved them before. We must not again go into the camp. We must sit down at the council table and, like men and brethren, lovers of liberty and justice, see that the right is done, see that the right is done to those who bear the heat and burden of the day, as well as to those who direct the labor of mankind. You cannot solve the problems of society amidst chaos, disorder, and strife. You can only solve them when men have agreed to be calm, agreed to be just, agreed to be conciliatory, agreed that the right of the weak is as majestic as the right of the strong; and when we have come to that mind in the counsels of nations, we can then more readily come to that mind in our domestic counsels, upon which the happiness and prosperity of our own beloved people so intimately and directly depend."

Wilson's ideal would have won if meanness, intrigue, and envy could have been dethroned.

"Coveting the little, the instant gain,
The brief security,
And easy-tongued renown,
His enemies mocked the vision that his brain
Builds to a far, unmeasured monument,
And many bid his resolutions down
To the wages of their discontent."

"No; he must be defeated", was the cry of the pack at his heels, and thus unhappily ended his great movement for peace. His foolish enemies thought that this marked the end of what he sought to achieve, but the cause which he advocated has been taken by Franklin Roosevelt and Cordell Hull, whose influence for peace is being felt in the chancelleries of the world.

I pause to pay tribute to a gentleman of the old-fashioned school; one whose statesmanship and vision rise like Mount Rainier, snow-capped in the distance. I refer to the present Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull. In him we have what is so sorely needed in the tragical world in which we live. Quietly, serenely, patiently, with magnificent poise and dignity, he moves toward his great objectives, blazing his way through the wilderness of disappointment and despair, raising high the torch of peace and international cooperation, without which the world will die.

Sometimes when I meet this quiet gentleman whose power is concealed under a velvet glove, I realize how broad his vision really is. It sweeps horizons that touch the world with the beams of its magnanimity; it extends to the utmost limits of the earth and lends a helping hand to every man, woman, and child in distress. Sometimes this type of man is lonely; and when I think of him, I am reminded of a few lines in John Drinkwater's play on Abraham Lincoln:

"Lonely is the man who understands.
Lonely is vision that leads a man away
From the pasture lands,
From the furrows of corn and the brown loads of hay,
To the mountain side,
To the high places where contemplation brings
All his adventurings.

"Shall a man understand,
He shall know bitterness because his kind,
Being perplexed of mind,
Hold issues even that are nothing mated.
And he shall give
Counsel out of his wisdom that none shall hear;
And steadfast in vain persuasion must he live,
And unabated
Shall his temptation be."

When I think of this modest gentleman, Cordell Hull, I recall a figure of a mighty man of Nazareth, described in one of Donn Byrne's books, "Brother Saul." Describing this man, whom he met, the old rug merchant, Joachim, said to Anne:

"My dear, he was a young lad, adzing a plank in his father's workshop. He had a face as fine as a woman's, but a man's face, and eyes so clear that I felt unclean in his presence. He's good, my dear; you can feel it in the air where he is. And a gentleman, a great gentleman, greater in feeling and dignity than Tiberius."

And what did the last war cost? Here are the figures from a speech by Woodrow Wilson:

"In order that we may not forget, I brought with me the figures as to what this war meant to the world. This is a body of business men, and you will understand these figures. They are too big for the imagination of men who do not handle big things. Here is the cost of the war in money, exclusive of what we loaned one another: Great Britain and her Dominions, $38,000,000,000; France, $26,000,000,000; the United States, $22,000,000,000 (this is the direct cost of our operations); Russia, $18,000,000,000; Italy, $13,000,000,000; and the total, including Belgium, Japan, and other countries, $123,000,000,000. This is what it cost the Central Powers: Germany, $39,000,000,000, the biggest single item; Austro-Hungary, $21,000,000,000; Turkey and Bulgaria, $3,000,000,000; a total of $63,000,000,000, and a grand total of direct war costs of $186,000,000,000—almost the capital of the world. The expenditures of the United States were at the rate of $1,000,000 an hour for 2 years, including nighttime with daytime. The battle deaths during the war were as follows: Russia lost in dead, 1,700,000 men, poor Russia that got nothing but terror and despair out of it all; Germany, 1,600,000; France, 1,385,000; Great Britain, 900,000; Austria, 800,000; Italy, 364,000; the United States, 50,300 dead. The total for all the belligerents, 7,450,200 men—just about seven and a half million killed because we could not have arbitration and discussion, because the world had never had the courage to propose the conciliatory methods which some of us are now doubting whether we ought to accept or not. The totals for wounded are not obtainable except our own. Our own wounded were 230,000, excluding those who were killed. The total of all battle deaths in all the wars of the world from the year 1793 to 1914 was something under 6,000,000 men, so that about a million and a half more men were killed in this war than in all the wars of something more than 100 preceding years."

But these figures are merely a regimentation of cold, inanimate facts. To the cynic they are meaningless. To the philosopher, they are things to brood over. To the statesman whose antique methods brought this tragedy, they are deadly gases; to the men and women of the world whose hearts have been broken by what happened, they present a picture of the deepest tragedy.

Behind these figures stand crosses marking the resting place of valiant youth who died in Flanders Field to save civilization. Behind these figures are boys like your son and mine, who, as the poet chants, "Were boys when you and I were a boy." Nestling behind these somber figures are young men, now wearing the cerements of the dead, who were slaughtered in their youthful prime. "Never to laugh nor love again, nor taste the summertime." If one looks behind these figures, he can see, as J. B. Priestly says, "parents who have grown lonely" and "girls who would have married, who have grown gray in spinsterhood." Behind these figures is "an old worn topic of war", "a story of men killed by greed and muddle and monstrous cross-purposes", "a story of war brought on by old men gobbling and roaring in clubs, by diplomats working underground, like monocled moles, by journalists wanting a good story, by hysterical women waving flags, by grumbling debenture holders, by strong, silent beribboned asses, a fear of apathy, or downright lack of imagination." "Behind these figures is the same old story, the same old muddle of war, with its same mistakes, reaching down to the very grave, to smoldering, mouldering bones."

Let us raise our voices in prayerful protest against war. Let us, as the Irish lad, Seumas, said, "Substitute beads for bullets, our Hail Marys and Pater Nosters for bursting bombs and the rattle of machine guns. Let us change the soldier song for the De Profundis. Let us substitute for the creed 'I believe in the gun almighty, the maker of heaven and earth,' a newer, finer, more lovely creed, in which that great lover of peace, Jesus of Nazareth, shall be the inspiration—a creed that will take away our hearts of stone and give us hearts of flesh—a creed that will take away murdering hate and give us His eternal love."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD at this point a letter from the President of the United States addressed to me as Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in reference to the 5-percent cut in salary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and order are as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 4, 1935.

The honorable the CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am sending you herewith a copy of the Executive order issued today, pursuant to authority of law, announcing the index figures for the cost of living for the 6 months' period ending June 30, 1928, the base period, and for the 6 months' period ending December 31, 1934.

You will note from the order that the cost-of-living index for the 6 months' period ending December 31, 1934, is 18.8 percent lower than the index for the base period, which would not even have justified any reduction in the original 15-percent compensation reduction prescribed in the act of March 20, 1933.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

(Inclosure.)

EXECUTIVE ORDER ANNOUNCING THE INDEX FIGURES FOR THE COST OF LIVING FOR THE 6 MONTHS' PERIODS ENDING JUNE 30, 1928, AND DECEMBER 31, 1934

By virtue of the authority vested in me by sections 2 and 3, title II, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 8, 12), as amended by section 21 (a), title II, of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935 (ch. 102, 48 Stat. 509, 521), I hereby announce:

First. That the index figures of the cost of living are—

(a) 171.0 for the 6 months' period ending June 30, 1928, the base period, and

(b) 138.9 for the 6 months' period ending December 31, 1934;

Second. That the cost-of-living index for the 6 months' period ending December 31, 1934, is 18.8 percent lower than the cost-of-living index for the base period; and Third. That this percent being in excess of the maximum percent prescribed by section 3 (b), as amended, the percentage of reduction applicable under section 2 (b) in determining the compensation of officers and employees to be paid during the period from January 1, 1935, to June 30, 1935, inclusive, is 5 percent.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1935.

PROPOSED BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] for 1 hour.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I always find that I get along better if I can get my friends from the East and the Northeast to relax a little. I was down to Baltimore the other night to a meeting of the Eastern Shore Society. A very distinguished professor from Yale University was the guest of honor and discussed the subject, Were the Puritans Pure? The subject appeared to be right bewildering to me, and I did not stay to hear his remarks concluded; but it reminded me of a picture I saw in a magazine a great many years ago. It was a picture of a young Puritan Roundhead in New England marching to church with a Bible under one arm and his gun under the other. The little log church is in the distance, and right alongside of the young man was a very beautiful girl dressed in the costume of the ballet. Her mouth was open slightly, her head was tilted on one side, and she appeared to be addressing the Puritan. The magazine offered a prize for the best title which could be given to the picture. The title which won the prize went this way:

Well, Brother Roundpate, which shall it be—
Onward Christian Soldier or Abide with Me?

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this Congress the Membership is attempting to ascertain the fundamental difficulties which confront us in the matter of national recovery. In other words, which way shall we go? At the last session of the Congress a bill known as the "monetary-authority bill" was under discussion in a subcommittee for about 7 weeks. The subcommittee then reported favorably to the full Committee on Banking and Currency. The matter was then taken up with the administration, and the committee was advised not to report the bill at that time. The bill has been reintroduced. The Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency will within the next few days be asked to appoint a subcommittee to consider that proposed legislation.

There is another bill which I hope will be considered by that subcommittee, along with the monetary-authority bill. The Treasury of the United States, and therefore the Government and the people of the United States, because of the so-called "national debt", has been largely under the control of the great banking houses of the country ever since the Civil War. The national debt now amounts to something over $26,000,000,000. The interest payments on the national debt amount to about $750,000,000 a year. Every time the Treasury undertakes to borrow money, the great bankers threaten the Treasury that unless the interest rates are fixed in accordance with their views the loan cannot be absorbed.

Some years ago I happened to be in conference with the President when the Secretary of the Treasury came in, and, with tears in his eyes, expressed doubt that a necessary loan could be floated. Then the thought came to me, what an astounding situation it is for the Government to borrow money from banks that the banks do not have, and then, by redepositing the money, loan the same money back to the banks and pay them interest on it. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I quite agree with the gentleman that that might be done up to a certain percentage of the money outstanding. What would the gentleman think would be a safe amount of currency to issue to replace the bonds which are now outstanding?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to answer the gentleman's question, and the gentleman knows that I do, but I can do it much better if he will allow me to proceed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very well.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Now, the total capital, surplus, and undivided profits in all the banks of the United States is less than $7,000,000,000. The total amount of private loans borrowed from all banks is about $34,000,000,000, or $27,000,000,000 more money than the banks have to loan. In addition to that, of this $26,000,000,000 of Government debt, the banks hold $13,000,000,000. You understand they only have less than $7,000,000,000 to loan. They have loaned to private enterprise $34,000,000,000, or $27,000,000,000 more than they have, and then they are loaning to the Government $13,000,000,000 of nothing in God's world but blue sky.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that the Federal Reserve banks hold more than $3,000,000,000 in addition to the $13,000,000,000 held by other banks which the gentleman mentioned?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think that is correct.

Mr. PATMAN. Making in all about $16,000,000,000 held by the banks and Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Now, what are we going to do about this? The banks have nothing except their capital, surplus, and undivided profits. The Government, which is society, has the wealth of the country, and, as I said before, the banks are lending to the Government money that they do not have, and the Government is loaning the same money back to the banks and paying them interest on it.

So it occurred to me that in view of the fact that the American Congress gives private banks the right to loan the same money 10 times—in other words, they are required to keep on an average only a 10-percent reserve—there is no reason why an independent bank should not be created, the sole stockholder of which should be the Treasury of the United States [applause], and that that independent bank should have the right to expand also 10 times, just exactly as a private bank can do.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman describe in greater detail the functions of that institution?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes; I will.

Now, the function of this bank would be, first, to pay off the obligations of the Government, and then to be the exclusive lending agency to the Government. We have free gold in the United States Treasury that is not doing anybody any good, amounting to $2,800,000,000. The Treasury has on deposit in private banks in addition to that the sum of $1,600,000,000, or a total of $4,400,000,000. This bill provides that a bank shall be formed with a board of directors, consisting of 3 appointed by the President, 2 appointed by the Senate of the United States, and 2 appointed by the House of Representatives, a total of 7 directors. The authorized capital of that bank is to be $4,000,000,000, which the directors have a right to call as it is needed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. COX. In that connection, has it occurred to the gentleman that the appointment of the directors would be an Executive function, which the House of Representatives cannot perform?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Well, I looked into that very carefully, and this bank is an independent institution. It is not strictly a governmental institution, and therefore I think the gentleman's objection not well founded.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not make it a governmental institution?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I wanted this bill so framed that no private banker could say it had any privilege of any kind or character that he did not already have. That was the purpose of it.

Mr. RANKIN. I am interested in protecting the American people from a repetition of what certain private bankers have already done to them. It seems to me that this ought to be a governmental institution.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Let me proceed for a minute. If the whole of this $4,000,000,000 were used, the bank could expand it 10 times, issuing notes in the amount of $40,000,000,000.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman inform the House the difference between the amount of gold in the Treasury and the money now in circulation?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The total amount of gold in the Treasury is over $8,000,000,000. In the Treasury is free gold, gold that is not backing up any kind of currency, to the extent of $2,800,000,000. The total bank deposits, which, of course, are based on the circulating medium, amount to $47,000,000,000.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. We have less than $6,000,000,000 in circulation, have we not?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Of real money; yes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. EAGLE. If the gentleman will permit, I may reply to the last question by saying that the seven forms of money in circulation—national bank notes, greenbacks, silver certificates, Federal Reserve bank notes, and Federal Reserve notes—the whole seven reach an outstanding total of $5,400,000,000. Were the Treasury under obligation to redeem all of it, which it is not, it has more than $8,000,000,000 in gold with which to do it.

Mr. SIROVICH. If the gentleman will yield, the Government, in other words, could redeem all the outstanding currency at one time, if it had to.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman's figures do not take into consideration the fact that much of this money has been lost and destroyed. I hope the gentleman will comment upon this. For instance, when the bills were changed to a smaller size, quite a large sum of money remained outstanding in large bills. Much of this money has been lost in fires, like the Chicago fire, shipwrecks, has been buried in the ground or has been sent to foreign countries and never returned, and much of our currency is in daily use in foreign countries.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. One of the leading financial minds of North America, if not the world, less than 3 years ago said that although formerly gold was the standard and London the money market of the world, today the standard of values throughout the world is the American dollar. Today the American dollar is in circulation throughout the civilized world; and, as the gentleman from Texas has just said, there are hundreds of millions of dollars of this money which is supposed to be in circulation which has been lost. Millions of dollars now in circulation in foreign countries never find their way back to the United States.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The best figure I can get is that there is actually less than $5,000,000,000 of real money in circulation in this country.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would suggest that the gentleman is making a very important speech, and I think we should refrain from asking him questions until he has finished, for it is very difficult if not impossible to follow up a serious line of thought when one is interrupted every 5 minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think, for the sake of accuracy, the remarks of the gentleman from Texas should be corrected. The gentleman from Texas stated there were seven kinds of money of which there are about $4,000,000,000 outstanding. I think the record will show there are eight kinds of money and that there is about $5,600,000,000 outstanding.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question along this particular line?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. I believe the gentleman stated that he proposes the establishment of an independent bank?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Does the gentleman take the position that Congress has no power to create a public banking institution?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. No; not at all. The particular institution I have in mind is to be created for the purpose of taking care of the national debt without any ripple whatever insofar as society is concerned. My position is that we have plenty of money to create a reserve for this bank which will be more than ample to take care of the entire national debt and pay the interest on it until it is all paid off.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. Would this institution have the right to pay off bonds which are now tax exempt?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It cannot pay off anything that is not callable. It cannot anticipate the due date of outstanding issues.

Mr. HOOK. Would this proposed institution have the right to pay off the nontaxable bonds that are due at this time and issue in their place new bonds that can be taxed?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. There would be no new bonds issued if this bill passes, because we would not have any more Government bonds. This bank would pay off the Government indebtedness. At the present time about $6,000,000,000 of the national debt is callable and could be paid off immediately.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield, but after this I shall ask not to be interrupted.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is not one of the reasons that the gentleman is advocating this bank the fact that just a little later when refunding operations are made are necessarily at a very much higher rate of interest, and is he not trying to start something whereby the Government will not be at the mercy of or have to meet the competition of private bankers?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is a very good statement, but what I want to do through the agency of this bank is to take the national debt away from private bankers and pay it off in its entirety.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I have examined the gentleman's bill. I believe the gentleman made the statement a few moments ago that this was to be a private institution. Does he not mean an independent governmental institution? Is not that what he proposes to create?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The only way in which it would be governmental is that the Treasury would own all its stock.

Mr. RANKIN. But, under the terms of the bill, does not the President make the appointments, and are not the appointees subject to removal?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes; the President makes 3 appointments, the House makes 2 appointments, and the Senate makes 2 appointments.

Mr. RANKIN. It would seem to me, then, that instead of calling it a private institution, it would be better to call it an independent governmental institution. That is what I would prefer.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The next question that is going to be raised is this: It is going to be said that this bill is inflationary. Well, of course, all of you know my view that the supply of money should increase with productivity. If we can produce more, we can also issue more money without a rise in the price level. One way to produce and distribute more is to issue money and encourage production. When I say "issue money", I do not mean to issue it any faster than production and distribution would justify. I have deliberately refrained from putting any sort of inflation in this bill, because I want to know what the private bankers have to say about the bill. I want to know what their objection is to the bill. There is no inflation in this bill. Of course, when this public debt and these notes are paid off, it will increase the reserves in the banks and enable them, therefore, to issue more money than they otherwise could. That would be inflationary.

But section 7 of the bill prevents that.

> As the notes in circulation provided for by this act increase in volume, the Federal Reserve Board shall progressively increase the reserve requirements of member banks of the Federal Reserve System so as to prevent any inflation of the deposit currency of the member banks because of the operation of this act.

Under legislation we passed last year the Federal Reserve Board now has this power, provided the President of the United States agrees.

The operation of this act will take away the necessity for any taxation to pay off the national debt.

It will not inflate the currency one dollar, but it will make it necessary to increase the bank reserves so that the banks will not be able to loan the same money 10 times over, as they are doing now. Just at random on Friday I picked up a newspaper and looked at the first bank statement I came to. This bank had a capital, surplus, and undivided profits of less than $7,000,000. It had due it in private loans $10,000,000, or $3,000,000 more than its capital and surplus, and it also owned $100,000,000 of Government bonds, on which the Government was paying this bank interest.

Here is the statement of the Chase National Bank of June 30, 1934. It has capital, surplus, and undivided profits of $216,000,000, but its total resources are marked up to $1,810,000,000. Now, listen to this: Among other things, it has loans, discounts, and bankers' acceptances of $621,566,000, or three times its total capital, surplus, and undivided profits. It owns Government bonds upon which the Government is paying interest to the amount of $417,000,000, or twice as much as its capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If this bill does not provide for expansion of the currency or, as the gentleman calls it, inflation, then it would not affect the commodity-price level?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It would affect it to the extent that it would not be necessary to tax in order to pay the Government debt.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand, but it is utterly impossible for the people who own property in this country, and especially the agricultural people, to ever pay the debts now hanging over them under the present price level. If we are going to do anything at all to the currency, we should at least have a liberal, controlled expansion to raise the commodity price levels to what they were in 1926 when these debts were contracted.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Unless we do that, we will never be able to pay the debt now hanging over us.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I fully agree with the gentleman, but there is pending legislation covering the gentleman's point. This particular bill was not drawn for that specific purpose. It was drawn to take care of the national debt—and for one other purpose. I hope the Members will listen to me very sympathetically with reference to this further matter. There is one other thing provided for in this bill, and it may be taken care of with $180,000,000 of this money in the Treasury which could be expanded 10 times. That other thing provided for is payment of all the depositors in all the banks in the United States who have not been paid in full.

I have made a careful study of the question of payment of depositors in closed banks. I have studied it historically. I find that originally when a man put money in a bank, he got the same money back. They were not called banks then. They were called goldsmiths. Later I find that he received a receipt and was either paid the same money or a corresponding amount of money.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How many millions of dollars would it take to pay back all the depositors in closed banks?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. About $1,500,000,000. I find later the goldsmiths decided that everybody would not call for his money at the same time, so they began to lend this money out, and instead of giving a receipt they simply gave a promise to pay. I find that originally a bank deposit was a trust fund; and if a banker could not produce the money when it was called for, he was guilty of a criminal offense. Then I find that as our system of fractional reserves expanded, courts said a bank deposit was nothing but a debt; however, the truth of the matter is that in good morals a bank deposit is a trust fund, and may I say further there is not one out of a hundred people who puts his money in banks who do not think his money is there, and that he has a right to go and get it at any time. He has no idea that it simply represents a debt from the bank to the depositor. So that in legislation providing for payment of depositors in closed banks you are not segregating one class of creditors from all other classes and saying that they shall be paid, and other creditors not paid, because in reality and in good morals those banks are trustees of their depositors' money and every cent should be returned.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. In paying off the depositors in the closed banks, how far back would the gentleman go?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Under this bill we would go back to January 1, 1930, and up to January 1, 1935.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. What does this bill do in reference to banks which have reopened with some of the assets segregated and payment of a certain percentage to the depositors? In other words, those banks which have reopened, but only a certain percentage of the deposits has been paid?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I do not know just what has been done in all the States. I presume it is as it is in the State of Maryland. In Maryland the bank will pay, say, 50 percent in cash, 25 percent in certificates of beneficial interest, and 25 percent in preferred stock. Under this bill certificates of beneficial interest and the preferred stock will be taken up.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. I know the gentleman has given a lot of thought and study to the history of banking and is familiar with the operations of the Bank of England and the Bank of France as well as other European institutions. The first part of this bill seems to bear some earmarks comparable with the operations of the Bank of England. I should like to know if that is true and whether the gentleman plans this bank to be operated to take care of the Government's credit, similar to the operations of the Bank of England in taking care of the credit of Great Britain?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. My understanding of the operations of the Bank of England is not like that of my brother. He may be right; but my understanding of the operation of the Bank of England is that it is a pretty hard taskmaster, insofar as the people of Great Britain are concerned.

Mr. PARSONS. But it does take care of the Government's credit, largely.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is not my understanding.

Mr. PARSONS. That is its primary purpose, although it is a private institution.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is a private institution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the gentleman knows from our past experience that I am somewhat in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. The gentleman made the statement that the Government of the United States should not pay the bankers interest on the bonds which they hold and which they deposit with the Treasury for the circulating privilege. I quite agree that we should follow out that thought as far as we possibly can, but in subsection (b) of section 5 of the bill which the gentleman has introduced (H. R. 2998) there is a provision that direct loans to the United States shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the board of directors, as nearly as may be in accordance with the current lending rates. The Government is paying on its obligations an average, I presume, of 2⅞ or 3 percent, while the current lending rates in most of the States are much higher than that, being from 5 to 7 percent. I wish the gentleman would explain where the Government is going to save any money on interest rates by the establishment of this bank if they pay the prevailing rate of interest instead of the rate which the Government now pays on its obligations.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Under the terms of the bill all profits of the bank go back to the Treasury as a franchise tax. This is the answer to the gentleman's question. There are no expenses in this connection except the expense of operation, such as salaries and things of that kind.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. THURSTON. Referring to section 6 of the bill, wherein you fix 1930 as the limit, is it not true that most of the banks in the agricultural districts and the small communities failed prior to that time, and should not their depositors have a right to this fund, the same as the depositors in the big city banks?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. For a great many years, I may say to the gentleman, in certain sections of the Middle West and West, there have been bank failures, but I think that the great crash of banks came after the 1st of January 1930.

Mr. THURSTON. The big banks.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. No; I do not think that. So far as I know—and I think I have a picture of the situation—there was no wholesale failing of banks until after the 1st of January 1930.

Mr. THURSTON. I differ with the gentleman. Owing to the oppressive policy of the Federal Reserve System and the action of the Comptroller of the Currency in requiring strict and harsh examinations, the small banks of the country failed by the hundreds prior to 1930.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Of course, so far as I am concerned, I would have no objection to going back of January 1, 1930, but it is perfectly obvious we have to stop at some point.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. With reference to banks failing prior to 1930, in one of my counties we had 36 banks and 27 of them failed prior to 1929 and never opened their doors afterward.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

There have been a good many interruptions, all of them perfectly legitimate, and I do not know that I have anything at this time that I can add except to say that, so far as I am concerned, I believe it can be mathematically demonstrated—I believe I can do it myself—that you cannot have anything except an apparent prosperity as long as you make your circulating medium out of a debt. It is not possible, and I believe it will be so demonstrated at the hearings on the monetary-authority bill, if there are any hearings on the bill.

I believe further that it can be demonstrated mathematically that when you build up your circulating medium on debts and a crash comes, there is no way you can start this apparent prosperity without going through complete deflation unless you change your monetary system.

I believe it will also be demonstrated that we are producing in this country now about $40,000,000,000 worth of property at present prices and that we can produce $200,000,000,000 worth of property or five times that we are now producing, and that our fundamental problem is to find ways and means to distribute this $160,000,000,000; and, of course, if we can distribute it, then we can produce it, and we will never do it by destroying hogs, by plowing up wheat, and by plowing up cotton. We have got to study the problem of distribution. We have been going at the matter in the wrong direction absolutely.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I have been hoping that the gentleman would give us a clear difference between the private banks as they now do business and the monetary authority as suggested under the gentleman's bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The monetary-authority bill does not suggest any specific method. The monetary-authority bill undertakes to set up a group of men who will have certain functions, one of which will be to ascertain just what ought to be done to correct the faults in the monetary system.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCREYNOLDS). The gentleman from Maryland has consumed 45 minutes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I thank the Chair.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. In order to get information, I want to ask the gentleman a further question. What do you propose will be accomplished by your monetary authority that is not being done under the present private banking system?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Under the present private banking system prosperity defeats itself. You cannot have prosperity under the present system, and I will tell you why. We manufacture our money out of bank loans. If the people get prosperous and begin to pay off the bank loans, they are destroying the money manufactured out of the loans, and you immediately have another depression. There is no way on God's earth by which you can have permanent prosperity as long as you create money out of loans. It cannot be done.

There is a movement on foot—there is a good bill—I am not the author of the bill, but I have seen it—which requires banks to have 100-percent reserves so that debts can be paid off without taking money out of circulation. I can illustrate what I am talking about. A prominent man made a speech at the Century of Progress Fair in Chicago. He said we owed in this country about $200,000,000,000; and if we were thrifty and behaved ourselves, we could pay $25,000,000,000 a year, so that in 8 years we would not owe any money at all.

I wrote him a letter. I knew him very well. I said I should like to know under our present system, where money is manufactured out of debts, what we will do for money after our debts are paid off. There would be very little money in existence.

These are things that have to be approached and studied without any relationship to anybody's private interest, and it is a terribly hard thing to do.

It is perfectly obvious that in a system where our money is derived from our financial obligation to bankers, the problem is a tremendously hard thing to approach, but it must be done if democracy is going to be saved.

Four years ago some of the best minds in this country did not think there was one chance in a thousand of saving democracy—but it looks better now.

But I tell you again that if you have starving people, people without shelter, people without clothing, people without enough to eat, and at the same time you destroy the things that would give them the necessities of life, they will not stand for it forever. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In the bill the gentleman provides a capitalization of $4,000,000,000 with the provision that currency or notes may be outstanding against that of forty billion, qualified by the statement that it shall not exceed the national debt. I do not want to seem to press the gentleman, but in the early part of his address I asked what figure he felt we could safely issue in new currency without getting into the realm of inflation.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I attempted to answer that by quoting section 7 in the bill which provides that as the notes in circulation provided for by this act increase in volume, the Federal Reserve Board shall progressively increase the reserve requirements of member banks of the Federal Reserve System so as to prevent any inflation of the deposit currency in member banks.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The excess reserves in the Federal Reserve System are something like $2,000,000,000.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. This does not affect them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. How would it be possible for the member banks, or the banks of the United States, to increase their reserves to the point of $40,000,000,000 if it were found necessary to issue $40,000,000,000 of currency?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. They have $47,000,000,000 now on deposit. If they were compelled to keep 100-percent reserve, they could take care of $44,000,000,000, but as a matter of fact we would never need that much.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. There will be no further issuance of governmental tax-exempt securities under the gentleman's bill?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. There would not be any at all. Under the bill they would all be taken up.

HOSPITALIZATION OF VETERANS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which at the last session of the House we passed House Resolution 29, and to repass it with an amendment changing the number 413 to no. 426.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the matter was referred to me and, as far as I know, there is no objection on this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the figures "413" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "426."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this is to correct a clerical error in a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Resolution 33, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 33

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Seventy-fourth Congress is authorized, as a committee, by subcommittee, or otherwise, to continue until March 1, 1935, the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 226 of the Seventy-second Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by House Resolution 226 of the Seventy-second Congress. The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $5,000 under House Resolution 273 of the Seventy-second Congress is hereby continued for such purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this is simply to clean up the remainder of the work. No additional appropriation is to be asked?

Mr. MEAD. No additional appropriation. It is merely to permit the committee to continue until the Post Office Department has completed its investigation of the ocean mail contracts.

Mr. SNELL. And the rest is all practically complete at this time?

Mr. MEAD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes on the same subject discussed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NO MORE TAX-EXEMPT, INTEREST-BEARING BONDS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. He always makes an interesting talk. It is constructive, and I hope the Members of the House who did not hear it will read the speech in the RECORD. I am substantially in accord with his views. I am in hearty accord with what he said about stopping the issuance of tax-exempt, interest-bearing securities. I am not in accord with his views in regard to paying off 100 percent the depositors in all closed banks.

LOST OR DESTROYED MONEY

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] asked a question at the end of the gentleman's remarks to which I would like to address my remarks before commencing the talk I desire to make. Today we have about five and a half billion dollars, theoretically, in circulation. That is, presuming that all the money that has ever been issued is still outstanding. That is not taking into consideration the fact that over a period of 75 years, or longer, much of this money has been lost or destroyed. We know that some of it was destroyed in the Chicago fire. We know that much of it has been lost in shipwrecks. We know that much of it has been burned and lost in other ways, and buried in the ground. Much of it has been hoarded by criminals, even. Often it is discovered that criminals years ago buried money which is just now being discovered. When the old bills, the large ones, were called in several years ago, they were being replaced with new ones. About a year ago it was made known that $500,000,000 of that money had never been brought in for redemption. I do not know what the figures are now, but there is a very large sum outstanding.

Other countries use our money. Poland and Cuba use our money almost exclusively. Many foreign governments and possessions use our money. Consequently, much of our money is not here at all, but is in foreign countries. But theoretically and presumably, we have five and one-half billion dollars in circulation.

BANKS HAD $1.75 TO PAY EVERY $100

When all the banks of the country closed in March 1933 the banks had in their vaults about $1.75 to every $100 that they owed their depositors. One dollar and seventy-five cents to every $100. That does not mean that was all the money they had access to, because in the Federal Reserve banks and other banks they had an additional sum, which, however, would not aggregate more than $2 to every $100 that they owed their depositors. Therefore, taking the two, they did not have, or have available more than $3.75 in money to every $100 that they owed their depositors. You will wonder how they could do business. The reason is that the people do not all call for their money at the same time, no more than all people who are insured by life-insurance companies die at the same time. They were able to do business. But they with that small amount of money were doing a business aggregating hundreds of billions of dollars a year. Individual depositors were owed about forty-odd billion dollars when all the banks closed, almost $50,000,000,000.

PAY OFF NATIONAL DEBT WITH NEW MONEY

My theory of it is, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] that you can pay off the national debt of this Government with United States notes—new money—and not disrupt our financial system if you will do it gradually, and at the same time increase the reserve requirements of banks. As it is today, those banks can extend loans amounting to $10, on the average, to every $1 that the bank has in its vault. We can change that. As we put additional money into circulation we can say that hereafter a bank cannot loan more than $8 to every $1 or $5 to every $1 or $3 to every $1, and finally we can reach that stage, which I hope we will reach some day, where we will have 100 cents in money for every dollar that the banks owe their depositors. In other words, the banks would not be permitted to extend loans when they did not have the money with which to make the loans. They would only be permitted to extend loans when they had actual money to make them.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In our study of the question last year it developed that the economists who appeared before our committee were all of this accord, that the volume of money outstanding had very little relationship to the price-commodity index.

Mr. PATMAN. Under our system, that is true, since money only represents 5 to 10 percent of our circulating medium. The remainder is represented by bank credit, which we should control.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And that the velocity of credit currency controlled the price-commodity index. Now, as we issue cash currency or bank notes, or anything of that nature, we have a tendency to create the thought in the minds of the people that the price of commodities is going up and they, fearful of that, turn their cash into commodities, and along with that goes the desire to buy commodities in addition to the amount of cash which they have outstanding, and thereby the velocity of credit currency is accelerated to the point that we have inflation. That is what brought on the French inflation, the Austrian inflation, and the German inflation. I am in hearty accord with certain phases of the gentleman's program, but I wish the gentleman would tell me and this House what plan he has for the control of this credit currency that always gets away from us in time of rising prices.

CHANGE RESERVE REQUIREMENTS OF BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. Well, I am telling the gentleman the way to keep it from getting away from us is to change the reserve requirements of the banks. If you were to issue $20,000,000,000 in money and did not change the reserve requirements for banks, the banks could issue $200,000,000,000 in credit on that; but as you increase the volume of money, if you want a safety valve to prevent undue expansion of the currency, you should change the reserve requirements of the banks at the same time and, if necessary, take actual money out of circulation. Then, if you need expansion, you can liberalize the reserve requirements and make it easier for credit to be put into circulation. I understand that if you inflate to the extent that there is fear in the minds of the people, there will be flight from the dollar to commodities, but none of us hopes to go that far. We expect to have these safety valves along with all these measures so as to protect the people against undue expansion or inflation. There is much said about protecting the people from inflation but too little said about protecting them from deflation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PATMAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What I had in mind particularly was this situation: As you put out this currency and create this fear, people start buying, and they create their own currency; they create their own credit. They start issuing bank checks, bills of exchange, and things of that nature, which the gentleman knows is considered as money, as far as inflation is concerned.

Mr. PATMAN. And I am telling the gentleman now how to prevent that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I have $1,000 in a bank, this Government has no jurisdiction over the number of checks which I write against that $1,000, and this Government has no jurisdiction over the number of times those checks will be turned over before they get to the bank. That is what I am fearful of with respect to the gentleman's program.

Mr. PATMAN. That is true if we use our present system of credit and not actual money. I want to change it to 100-percent money reserve; then the opportunities for such credit inflation do not exist.

ENORMOUS GOLD RESERVE

Mr. WOLCOTT. How is this money to be redeemed?

Mr. PATMAN. We have in the Treasury today over $8,000,000,000 in gold. We could pay off our entire national debt and have a safe gold reserve, and go back on the gold standard having more gold per dollar than the foreign countries of Europe have ever had to back up their currencies; and we could do this with our present gold supply of $8,000,000,000. We have $2,800,000,000 of gold in the Treasury which is the Government's profit on revaluation of gold. It is included in the $8,000,000,000 mentioned.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I believe the gentleman said he could pay off the entire national debt with this $8,000,000,000 in gold. Is this statement based on the issuance of money with a 40-percent gold backing?

Mr. PATMAN. The reserve would not be as much as that, but it would be a safe gold reserve. England stayed on the gold standard 100 years with a 10-percent and less gold reserve. On a 40-percent gold standard we can issue $20,000,000,000. Since we have only $5,500,000,000 in circulation, $14,500,000,000 more may be issued on gold and have a 40-percent reserve. In addition we have a billion ounces of silver that may be used as a reserve for the issuance of a larger amount.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Then the gentleman would pay off the national debt with paper money backed by less than the $8,000,000,000 in gold?

Mr. PATMAN. That could be done; yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. One of the morning papers quoted the Speaker as having said that with the change in the discharge rule requiring 218 signers to discharge a committee, the House was hog-tied and we would have no social legislation except such as was on the administration's program.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman to ask me a question regarding the banking system or the matter about which I am talking. I do not yield to the gentleman for any other purpose. I do not know what the Speaker said or what the newspapers carried.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sorry.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a question on this subject; yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The former gentleman who addressed the House said that anything the banks held with which to pay off depositors was blue-sky. The gentleman who now has the floor desires more real money. Does not the gentleman think that when we give up securities and get back only 60 percent of the value, many times, of the security measured in dollars, that the bank takes from us even more than dollars? Is not this 40 percent blue-sky?

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman claim that he gets only 60 cents for a dollar today?

Mr. GIFFORD. No.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman get 100 cents today just as he did before March 4, 1933?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman understands what I mean. If he goes to a bank to borrow money, he has to put up something more than the value in dollars of the money he borrows. In other words, he gets back something like 60 percent, measured in value, of the security he lodges with the bank. The bank holds a reserve over and above the value of the loan. The security held by the bank may well represent the real value, perhaps more value than the dollars. The statement has been made that there is a point when confidence in those dollars may be destroyed. The gentleman recognizes the truth of this statement.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will not take up more of my time. Although he is making a very interesting statement, it does not change what I have said in that regard.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Several years ago when this matter was discussed before the Ways and Means Committee, I remember a gentleman by the name of Dawes came before the committee. He was very vehement in attacking us because he said we were disturbing confidence. Within 60 days this self-same gentleman borrowed $90,000,000 to save his own bank; and I understand that the Government now is suing to recover $60,000,000 of the loan.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD TAKE OVER FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. PATMAN. Instead of proceeding along the line suggested by the gentleman from Maryland and creating a private bank the entire stock of which shall be owned by the Government, the officers of which shall be appointed by the President, by the House, and by the Senate, I would much prefer that we consider taking over the Federal Reserve Banking System.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In answer to the gentleman who has just spoken, my good friend from Mississippi, I hold no brief, of course, for the bank in Chicago which borrowed the $90,000,000, but I have been told that that loan by the Federal Government prevented a debacle in Illinois such as we had in Detroit. If it did, then I as a taxpayer think it was pretty good business on the part of this Government to loan the banks in Chicago $90,000,000 to prevent losses such as we suffered in Detroit.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas will yield, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] is mistaken, for the debacle came in Chicago just the same.

Mr. PATMAN. There are 12 Federal Reserve banks in this Nation. As originally framed, the Federal Reserve law was a good one and the Federal Reserve banks were intended to serve a useful purpose; but the law has been changed by these so-called "perfecting amendments" until the Federal Reserve Banking System no longer serves the very useful function it was organized to serve. It has failed to extend credit at a time when credit was needed. The Federal Reserve Banking System has almost gone out of business except in the bond-brokerage business and the use of Government credit to buy Government bonds. It has today very few millions of dollars in bills it has purchased or rediscounted for member banks. They do, however, hold $3,500,000,000 in United States Government bonds. I say that it is an idiotic system that we have permitted to grow up. In other words, for the Government to let any banking institution or system on earth use the Government's credit to purchase United States Government bonds and then the Government continue to pay interest on those bonds is not sound business. It is nothing more than though I, having a $3,000 mortgage against my home, give you $3,000 to pay the mortgage, you pay the mortgage and have it transferred to yourself and still expect me to continue paying interest on this liquidated mortgage. This is the situation we are in with regard to the Federal Reserve banks holding United States Government bonds. These bonds were purchased with Government credit and the Government should not continue to pay $40,000,000 a year interest on these bonds while they are being held in this way.

GOVERNMENT CAN ISSUE A SOUND DOLLAR BILL IF IT CAN ISSUE A SOUND DOLLAR BOND

Furthermore, the private banks of the country, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has just stated, hold about $13,000,000,000 of Government bonds; and when they collect interest on those bonds, they are collecting nothing but a Government subsidy or bonus, and they should never be permitted to collect it. The Government should not issue such bonds. Thomas A. Edison was right when he said that any government that could issue a dollar bond that is good can issue a dollar bill that is good. The only difference is the bond draws interest and the bill does not draw interest. The bill is easier to pay because it does not draw interest, and usually the people who are objecting to paying the debts with this money, under a safe, sound system, are those who are drawing interest on Government bonds which are unnecessary for this Government to issue. We are paying this year nearly $800,000,000 interest on bonds on which we should not pay one dime. It is useless; it is unnecessary. The Government debt can be paid off, as indicated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and at the same time not have undue expansion of the currency if you do not want undue expansion of the currency.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM PRIVATELY OWNED

Remember that the Federal Reserve Bank System we are talking about is not a Government-owned institution. It is true that the Government has a limited and restricted supervision over those banks through an indirect board that exists here in Washington, but they have 12 banks and 12 boards of directors. These banks are owned by private banks that are member banks. The Government does not own one penny of stock in them. Last year a group of Members of this House made a trip to New York City, and one of the objects of the trip was to go through the Federal Reserve bank. While we were down in the bank vault, 50 feet below sea level, Governor Harrison was showing us where the gold used to be until, as he said, we took it away from him, and one of the gentlemen from the West said, "You took it away from us first." I asked him where the directors' room was. He stated that it was up on the tenth floor. I told him that was the room I wanted to see. He said: "There is nothing up there to see; but if you want to go up and see it, all right." I told him I desired to see that room. We went up there and we found that the directors' room was on the north end of the building. Of course, "directors' room" does not mean anything. So I asked him, "Where is the Federal Reserve agent's room?" He showed us a suite of rooms on the east side and told us that "These are the Federal Reserve agent's rooms. This is his private office." The Federal Reserve agent used these rooms when acting as Federal Reserve agent.

I next asked him, "Where is the office of the chairman of the Board?" We then walked across the hall to the west side and he told us, "Here is the office of the chairman of the Board and his suite of rooms where all of his stenographers and assistants are employed." It was just like on the other side. I next said, "I want you to explain to me and to these people assembled here why you have two offices for one official." And it is the same person. He is the Federal Reserve agent on the east side and chairman of the Board on the west side. The only difference is when he is Federal Reserve agent, he is supposed to represent this great Government of ours. In that capacity he has the privilege of calling up the Bureau of Engraving and Printing here in Washington and have money printed and sent to him. The money will be printed and sent to him in New York City.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REPRESENTS BOTH BANKS AND GOVERNMENT

Mr. PATMAN. When that money is sent up there, he does not send the securities down here to deposit for that money; he deposits them up in New York City. When the money comes back, he goes across the hall and becomes chairman of the Board. He then represents the member banks of that Federal Reserve district. It is his business to listen to those banks in reference to putting out that money. May I say further that two-thirds of the directors are elected by the banks and only one-third are appointed by the Federal Reserve Board; therefore, they have a balance of power. These Federal Reserve agents acting in their dual capacity I do not think are in position to properly represent the interests and the general welfare of the people of this Nation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

PRINTING-PRESS MONEY

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. In its final analysis the Goldsborough measure is purely a printing-press proposition, is it not?

Mr. PATMAN. May I say to the gentleman that there is a printing-press proposition going on today. Four tons of new money will be turned out over here at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing today if the daily average is maintained. The money will go to the banks. If that is a printing-press proposition, of course, the Goldsborough bill is also a printing-press proposition. They are both just the same.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. If the measure is sound, why the necessity of setting up this banking institution? Why not just issue the currency to pay off the Government debt?

Mr. PATMAN. There will have to be some authority to go through. Someone must look after the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That would save the expense of administration.

Mr. PATMAN. Five hundred and thirty-one Members of the House and Senate could not very well look after the matter. It would be as impossible for them to do that as it would be for the 300,000 people you represent to come here and do for themselves what they have sent you here to do. They just could not get anywhere.

FOUR TONS OF PAPER MONEY DAILY

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is running every day. They turn out about 4 tons of paper money a day. Each pound contains 500 bills, whether they be dollar bills or $10,000 bills. This money goes out every day to the banks of the country.

The money that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] proposes to issue and the money I propose to issue is no more fiat money or baloney dollars than the money issued every day by the banks of the country. The bankers hold to that fiat-money view, but they do not stop and explain that the money they handle every day is fiat money, according to their own definition, and that the credit they handle is also fiat credit. Let us discuss the national currency that the national banks of this country have obtained. There are some $980,000,000 of Government bonds deposited to secure it, some payable in 1940 and some payable in 1945. They can deposit the bonds and get new money in return. They do not put up gold. They do not put up any other security, and the money they issue is fiat money if there is any money on earth that is fiat money, according to their own definition of fiat money. When the Federal Reserve banks of this country put up or deposit with themselves three and a half billion dollars of United States Government bonds, as they have, and get $3,500,000,000 in new money in return, it is just as much fiat money as any money on earth, if you are going into the subject of fiat money, and use the bankers' own definition of what constitutes fiat money.

Nevertheless, it is good money; it is backed by the credit of this Nation; it is a blanket mortgage on all the property of all the people of this country; it is a mortgage against the incomes of the people. It will be paid, but, according to a strict definition of fiat money, that money and practically all the money we have in circulation today is fiat money.

BANK SERVICE CHARGES

Before I conclude—and I do not want to take up any more of your time—I wish to invite your attention to the fact that the banks in my section are doing something that is highly deflationary. When an effort was made to pass a 2-cent tax on checks, the banks said, "We cannot stand that; it will cause people to take their deposits out of our banks and they will quit doing business with banks. We must have these small accounts, and we do not want you to put any tax on them." Well, the tax expired the other day, on January 1, and there is now no check tax; and I hope there will not be any check tax put on by this Congress. However, the banks have instituted what is known as a "service charge"; and, according to the amount of money one has in the bank or the amount of business done, he is charged for issuing checks or doing business with that bank. This is driving people away from the banks. If one has a balance of $25, that amount is sufficient for a reason to justify the bank extending loans amounting to $250. We should not drive these small accounts from the banks; and besides, the people are entitled to some consideration by the banks, since the Government is subsidizing them.

I want to tell you why the banks should be persuaded not to do this. In the first place, a national bank has a great privilege when it receives a charter from the United States Government. It has almost an exclusive privilege.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman referred to the service charge now being put on by the banks. This has given me some little worry, and I was very much interested in having the stamp tax on checks removed. Does the gentleman know whether or not this service charge is being imposed at the instance of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation or whether it is a voluntary action on the part of the banks?

Mr. PATMAN. If it is done at the instance of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, it should be stopped; but my understanding is, it is the voluntary action of the banks, I may say to the distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and I presume it will take legislation to stop it.

Let me now finish, if you please, my statement of why they should not put on a service charge.

When a bank is granted its charter, it has almost an exclusive right to do business there in that locality. It must be shown there is necessity for a competitor or another, or no competitor can come into the field. This is a great right, and for this right and privilege a bank should be glad to extend a certain amount of free business to the people residing in that community.

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. I do not think the banks of the country generally are doing this. They are not charging a service charge in my section.

Mr. PATMAN. I am pleased to hear that.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The banks are doing that in my district and even in my home city. They even charge you for making a deposit. What does the gentleman think is the reason for this?

Mr. PATMAN. Let me finish my statement, and I shall be very glad to attempt to answer the gentleman's question.

First, they are given a charter; and if the bank is capitalized for $500,000, it can take $500,000 in Government bonds, deposit them with the Treasury of the United States, and get $500,000 of new money. They can do this up to the full amount of their capital stock. It is true they deposit a redemption fund of 5 percent to remain there until the bonds are taken up again, but the bank gets new money in return for these bonds, and they continue to get interest on the bonds that they have deposited and continue to use the money. Therefore they get a bonus from the Government of the United States for putting money in circulation. These are two privileges—the great charter that is given them and the circulation privilege which gives them a bonus for putting money into circulation.

Next is the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation fund. Did the banks put up the money for the capital stock of this Corporation? No; they did not. The banks put up $39,000,000, and the Government put up $300,000,000.

There are three rights which they have. The Government is paying their insurance premium to guarantee their deposits, or practically all of it or more than four-fifths of it, and then the circulating privilege is a bonus for putting money into circulation and then their charter gives them an exclusive right to do business.

Then, in addition to this, Mr. Speaker, the R. F. C. has purchased one-half of the stock of practically all the national banks of the country and this stock is known as "preferred stock", which the R. F. C. holds and by law passed by this body, it is tax exempt. Therefore these banks are pleading tax exemption in their cities, counties, and States on one-half of their capital stock. So the Government is giving them a tax exemption of 50 percent and is paying their insurance premiums to insure their deposits of under $5,000 and is giving them a bonus to put money in circulation and is giving them this exclusive right to do business, which is a great monopoly right. In addition they are allowed to lend $10 to every $1 they have in their vaults or with Reserve banks. Certainly they should be required to do a certain amount of business free for the American people. It is not right for the people through the Government to do so much for the banks and then permit the banks to charge the people for every little service they render. [Applause.]

I respectfully submit for your consideration the following:

1. The Federal Reserve banks should be taken over by the Government and operated in the interest of all the people, banks, industry, agriculture, and commerce.

2. No private corporation, or corporation owned by private corporations, should have the right to issue money.

3. The Government should issue currency when in need of money instead of tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds.

4. No additional taxes should be levied as long as we need additional money.

5. Very few of the bankers of the country, even the real good ones, have ever studied or thought anything about this monetary problem.

6. A billion dollars a year can be used by the Government to a better advantage than paying it as interest on Government bonds that may be used as a basis for the issuance of currency.

7. Direct credits should receive the thoughtful consideration of the people.

8. Opposition to any progressive proposal may be expected from those who will be deprived of special privileges, the die-hard, orthodox, hard-money advocates, and the poll-parrot satellites of Wall Street who only repeat what others say and never think for themselves.

9. We need and must have more money as a circulating medium, but we should not issue more Government bonds in order to get it.

Money itself is of no value; it is a simple tool desired for the one purpose of making exchanges. Money is no mysterious thing; no mystic principles veil or obscure it; it is a tool for making exchanges, just as a hammer is a tool for driving nails.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 34

Resolved, That during the Seventy-fourth Congress the Committee on Appropriations shall be composed of 39 members;

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall be composed of 27 members; and

The Committee on Rules shall be composed of 14 members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROPOSED BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 7 minutes on the same subject that was discussed by the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I asked several questions, the Members will, perhaps, understand that I am somewhat interested in this proposition.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] spoke of a national debt of $26,000,000,000. In the Budget message which has just been read there was a statement to the effect that in July the debt will be $31,000,000,000, and with an anticipated $4,000,000,000 of additional debt next year it will be $35,000,000,000. This without any mention of the contingent debt, through which—over a period of a few more years—we may drop another billion dollars.

Now, at this very moment when the country is anxiously awaiting a return of confidence within banking circles, on this very first day we have presented to us this matter of a central bank. It is small wonder that some scheme is presented to take care of a debt which may reach forty billions. How can that ever be liquidated unless resort is had to some extraordinary method?

Hence this central bank is presented to you as a medium for the issuance of printed money and to avoid the payment of interest. The private individual or corporation will still be obliged to pay interest money, but the Government must be allowed to finance itself in a manner totally unlike that prescribed for them. This Government is already carrying on an immense business because private industry has temporarily failed to function normally, and we are told that Government instrumentalities will be maintained and increased for this purpose so long as private capital remains too timid to invest itself.

I am astonished that the statement which I made a few moments ago seemed to be novel to so many Members. When the bankers met in Washington, recently, and the subject of a central bank was presented to the President, according to the report carried by the press, he said, "Who brought up that ghost?" The bankers were much encouraged by the belief that there was no danger from that source.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FISH. When the gentleman is talking of this increased debt of thirty-five or thirty-six billion dollars, will he also point out that the Government has to pay interest, amounting to about a billion and a half dollars a year, which is 50 percent of its total revenue?

Mr. GIFFORD. I was about to point out that we have also been getting money at a very low interest rate. A prominent banker not long since, when asked what they were going to do in the future, replied in my hearing, "We are going to do what we are told to do." They have been doing just that. If the banks did set the rate of the interest which the Government has recently been paying, as suggested by the last speaker, then they set it mighty low. But the fear is that as the refunding of these short-term securities must be made in long-term securities later on, the rate of interest will certainly have to go back to 3 or 4 percent, or even to a higher rate. Then the Government will indeed be forced to arrange for the payment of a billion and a half for interest alone.

The other thought that I wished to express has to do with my vote for the Goldsborough bill some 3 years ago.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Not unless I can get more time. Will the gentleman agree to get me more time? Of course, I would be yielding to a gentleman who presumably knows much more than I do about this subject.

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, I do not know much about it, but the gentleman is opposed to the principle embodied in the Goldsborough bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am coming to that. I said that I voted for the Goldsborough bill when it was presented. I sympathized with the gentleman's view that there was not enough money in circulation, so we started the printing presses going at high speed and about $300,000,000 in new money was issued and made available to the Federal Reserve banks, for the use of their member banks.

However, it turned out that these banks did not use it or need it. Later on we made a further authorization of $3,000,000,000 to become available in the same manner, as a threat to be employed against private banking if it failed to purchase our Government securities.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman think that the banks can afford to be generous with the Government when the banks are selling to the Government the Government's own credit?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, the gentleman from Texas has harped on that subject for 2 or 3 years. We gave the banks the privilege of buying the low-rate Panama Canal bonds and of issuing money against them. Recently, when we gave the Federal Reserve an opportunity to issue money——

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for an explanation?

Mr. GIFFORD. It needs one.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman talks about Federal Reserve bank notes. They have to pay the insignificant sum of one-half of 1 percent a year. On Federal Reserve notes they do not have to pay a penny. They pay 27 cents a thousand to have them printed.

Mr. GIFFORD. Then, it is indeed strange that they do not avail themselves of this privilege. It cannot be very profitable. These speakers are trying to tell the Members of this Congress that nothing is of value except money backed by a small reserve of gold, which is itself merely a commodity. Do not let them make you believe that when you go to a bank to borrow money, you do not give the very best of security and then secure a loan of only 60 or 70 percent of its full value, measured in dollars. These securities are not "blue sky" value, as declared by the first speaker. The gentleman from Texas stated that we could issue paper money up to a point at which the confidence of the people would not be disturbed. But he has little notion as to when this breaking point will be reached. Go beyond it, and you will need money by the basketful. It would seem to be our clear duty to oppose certain things that common sense—even a little common sense—shows us to be unsound and highly dangerous.

Unfortunately, many Members seem to be persuaded by the enthusiasts, such as Professor Fisher, who convinced so many of you gentlemen of the efficiency of the commodity dollar, now wisely forgotten.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman brought up a very interesting question a while ago about Federal Reserve bank notes and Federal Reserve notes. If the gentleman were in charge of a Federal Reserve bank, knowing that the Federal Reserve bank note must pay a tax of one-half of 1 percent a year, and that on the Federal Reserve notes he would pay only for the cost of printing them and no tax, which would he get, Federal Reserve bank notes or Federal Reserve notes?

Mr. GIFFORD. But when they loan to the Government, they get about one-half of 1 percent.

I was speaking to the new Members about Prof. Irving Fisher, who is, I presume, regarded as a real economist. Many here were won over to his doctrines. But what did he finally say? "Oh, what a pity that there was an election in 1932." The commodity-dollar idea that he advanced could not work. Read the theories of other professors of economics on the subject of money and you will find that their opinions are so completely divergent that we should indeed hesitate before embarking for any such dangerous experiments.

The message of the President, fine as it was in its dealing with many of the matters upon which it touched, was utterly lacking in any statement tending to encourage the investment of money in private industry. It was a remarkable omission. Above all else, encouragement and assurance should have been forthcoming.

And now, at the very start of this Congress, we are advised that a central bank should be created further to embarrass our existing banking institutions. Let it be remembered that although we use the Federal Reserve bank principally to act as our agent in the financing of Government operations, it was not established for that particular purpose. It was set up as a central repository for all the banks of the country. Members of the System borrow money of Reserve banks at all times as the need presents itself. On the whole, it has functioned admirably. Do not put it out of business just because we have seen fit to make it our agent in the carrying on of governmental loan functions. The member banks have done this with a high degree of success and to our advantage. They have allocated these loans at a very low rate of interest.

What the country especially needs at this particular time is to regain a little confidence. God knows we need it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 35

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, to wit: John Taber, of New York; Robert L. Bacon, of New York; Richard B. Wigglesworth, of Massachusetts; Clarence J. McLeod, of Michigan; Lloyd Thurston, of Iowa; Florence P. Kahn, of California; John T. Buckbee, of Illinois; Chester C. Bolton, of Ohio; W. P. Lambertson, of Kansas; D. Lane Powers, of New Jersey; J. William Ditter, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. RANKIN, for 5 days, on account of being called to Jackson, Miss., to help in the struggle now being waged to rescue the people of that city from the ravages of the Power Trust;

Mr. DIETRICH, of Pennsylvania, for today, on account of illness; and

Mr. BINDERUP, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

EDUCATORS SHOULD TAKE OATH

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an article which appeared in the National Republic, written by my colleague, Mr. EDWARD A. KENNEY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER]?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, is this his own article?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. It is his own article, written by himself, on the subject, The Educator Should Take an Oath.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the National Republic, written by the gentleman from New Jersey, Hon. EDWARD A. KENNEY:

EDUCATORS SHOULD TAKE OATH

ORGANIZED OPPOSITION OF 700 TEACHERS IN NEW YORK TO "TEACHERS' OATH" AND EXPOSURES OF COMMUNISTIC TEACHINGS IN INSTITUTIONS FORCE ISSUE ON CONGRESS

"Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."—Abraham Lincoln.

That the example afforded by some of our enlightened States may be weighed by all others, I have introduced in Congress House Joint Resolution which has come to be known as No. 339; a resolution memorializing the States to require all teachers of the public schools and other public institutions of learning to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Since the introduction of this resolution, a certain teacher has said that he could take the oath, but it would have no meaning so far as he was concerned. Perhaps there are others like-minded; if so, they will be discovered by their actions and utterances. Many witnesses testifying in our courts have been styled "perjurers." The oath to speak the truth taken by them may have had no significance. Yet it would not be a wise public policy to strip the courts of the pledge of witnesses to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Our schools, vastly more than our courts, need the protection of an oath. And where teachers oppose the oath of allegiance to the Constitution and others disregard it, it is time to sound the warning, "Beware, America!"

The menace of communism and socialism is abroad in the land, and the real and great danger is in the child—the chief prey of these disloyalists. Consequently, loyal teachers are absolutely necessary.

The slogan of communism in America may be summed up in this statement attributed to a former Boston school teacher:

"Give us one generation of small children to train to manhood and womanhood, and we will set up the Bolshevist form of the soviet government."

Let me introduce you to the child who is of concern to us today. She is Barbara. Her age lies between 14 and 18. Her features, and occasionally her speech, betray the fact that her parents came from another land. She was born and lives in a tenement district of one of the large cities. The teacher has visited her home; it is a hovel. There is a steady conflict between Barbara and the trained nurse of the school. Barbara is not clean. A report is sent to the teacher. She speaks privately to Barbara about it; and as she does so, she has a vision of the two rooms in which the child, her parents, and three or four little brothers and sisters are huddled together. The teacher, the loyal teacher, feels motherly. Barbara is not bad at heart. The teacher likes her, pities her sincerely. She is the victim of her surroundings.

Barbara is intelligent; she passes her examinations with a high percentage, perhaps because she has a marvelous gift for languages. As a rule, she behaves well. Whenever she has an opportunity to point out the defects—what she thinks are defects—of various forms of government, she never fails to do so. That opportunity is sometimes hers when she has to read passages in history. At all times she is eager to speak of her rights, peoples' rights, and resents the teacher speaking of her duties, their duties. She will remind that her father pays taxes; she adds in a lower voice, "indirectly." (She remembers the teacher was in her home.) She likes to offer suggestions as to the way countries should be governed; it is an echo of Union Square. The teacher is diplomatic; she asks a question leading elsewhere.

Barbara belongs to the Young Pioneers organization. Perchance she has also joined the Young Communist League; she may be a member, too, of the National Students League. The latter's 1933 yearbook contains this startling statement: "The fact that the school and city officials are opposed to Communists does not mean that the student body should also. On the contrary, we have found in the course of our struggles that the Communists in our organization generally have the clearest understanding of student problems and their relation to society and often provide us with our best leaders." And further: "It must also be pointed out that there is a communistic league which also functions in the schools and colleges."

Like many others, Barbara will plan and participate in meetings of these organizations sometimes held in the public schools with a Communist teacher as official adviser. Her ambition leads her to be counted among those attending the 20 or more private schools holding instruction after public-school hours in anti-American and communistic doctrines.

On the 1st of May, Barbara is absent from school. She is in the Communist parade. She is on a float; she wears a red dress, waves frantically a red flag, and screams: "Down with the capitalists!"—etc. The next day she cannot recite; she is hoarse. She brings an excuse for absence. It says: "Barbara was absent because she had to go to the International Workers parade."

The leading members of the Young Pioneers urge her to do some propaganda work. Or, the Young Communist League may do so. She feels it her duty. She distributes some Communist literature to her schoolmates. She knows it is forbidden. She is caught. Others had been caught before her, most of whom were dismissed.

I should advise keeping in school the Barbara who obeys the rules of the school in regard to the nondistribution of Soviet literature. You might say that, after all, she has a right to her opinion. And there is always a chance to lead her to change her views. If the teacher is the kind that believes in a Supreme Being, one who does not advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence but adheres loyally to the ideals and principles of the Constitution of the United States, there is a good chance. Should the loyal teacher succeed in gaining her confidence and winning her affection—friendship is the goddess of understanding—much may be accomplished. There have been numerous cases where changes have been effected. I know teachers who have some to their credit.

I should recommend that the Barbara who has gone so far as to defy her principal and the rules of the school and distribute Soviet literature and poison the minds of other youth be summarily expelled; that she be forever deprived of an education at the expense of the city. Such example would have a salutary influence on the other young propagandists. She would then have to get along with whatever education she had, and she does wish a good education, she wants it badly, she desires to go to college, to the city's college. She dreads to go to a factory, like her elders at home, to sew on buttons. But if she is not expelled, she will keep up her work, her insidious work.

If permitted to remain in school, she will continue to seek recruits from her classmates to attend with her the meetings of the Young Pioneers. She will seek prominence in the Young Communist League, leading a drive for new memberships. At the special instructions received at the outside anti-American schools, she will be encouraged by others of her age and by her elders, too often disloyal public-school teachers who, like Barbara, have gone to the public schools and later to a university and finally secured a position as teacher with the opportunity of encouraging, fostering, and promoting communistic propaganda within the very confines of the classroom.

What protection shall America have?

An oath brings to the person taking it the fullest realization of his responsibility. It binds the affiant to the due execution of his trust whatever its character. Its propriety is obvious as a protection to society.

The oath to support the Constitution of the United States was conceived by the Federal convention which adopted it. Oath of allegiance was not required by the Articles of Confederation which preceded it, with the result that no binding obligation was felt. My State (New Jersey) raised objection to the articles because Members of Congress sat without first obligating themselves by oath. The oath exacted by the Constitution indisputably has made for its preservation. The idea was not one of necessity but was formulated on the theory that the Nation was entitled to the best security that could be furnished by those intrusted with the administration of its affairs. Its fixed purpose was to keep inviolate forever the basic fundamental law.

In its grant of cherished inalienable rights, liberties were safeguarded, and there was guaranteed to all freedom from political, religious, or other oppression. The checks and balances placed upon the three branches of government served to assure to mankind a haven of civilization nowhere else known, provided only those charged with its high responsibilities upheld the spirit, the principles, and ideals of the model document. How, then, was fealty to be insured? By the oath. The oath solemnized the obligation.

Presumably every American citizen knows that the first and every succeeding President of the United States has bound himself by oath to support the Constitution. But how many know that the very form of his oath is prescribed by its provisions? It might be well to reflect for just a moment upon the decidedly emphatic bond it demands from the President to keep the Constitution free from any violating acts of his own and to protect and defend it against the invasion of all others. By those who have attended the President's inauguration or listened to the inaugural ceremonies over the radio, these words, taken from the Constitution, may be recalled:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States" (art. II, sec. 1, clause 8).

After my election as a Member of the House of Representatives I was surprised at the number of persons who inquired of me, "When are you going to take your oath?" It was their way of asking when my term of office commenced. On many occasions I have heard reference made to other officials in a similar way, as for example, "John was sworn in today", the equivalent of saying that he began his official duties. Our people everywhere have come to regard the oath as a condition precedent to the assumption of a public trust. This grows out of the further constitutional provision:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned and the members of the several State legislatures and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; . . . (art. VI, clause 3).

By acts of Congress and the statutes of the several States holders of office affected with a public interest have been called upon from time to time to make oath to support the Constitution of the United States. With the growth of the Nation and its accompanying complexities, many public positions took on added importance and responsibility. As they have done so, it has been deemed prudent and altogether wise to extend the requirement of the oath so as to have all occupying places of honor and trust subscribe and swear to support the Federal Constitution.

The teacher in the public schools is, more than ever before in the peace-time annals of our country, the guardian of our civilization. Her task has not always been a simple one. Latterly, her school has become a veritable battleground. Throughout the world the enthusiasm of youth, the restlessness of the parent reflected in the young, the flaming desire of the boy and girl to spring to the relief of their depression-ridden families, all have brought about a new condition, a fresh problem for the teacher. Youth is an integral part of the new order as it exists in varying form in many of the countries of the world. Young men and women are the backbone of fascism, nazi-ism, and communism. In America our youth are engaged in eagerly seeking an outlet for new opportunity. Unless, therefore, the principles of freedom, justice, equality, and humanity as enunciated by the Constitution of the United States are inculcated in our boys and girls at the very beginning of their careers, there will be cause for grave concern for our Government. They have to be reminded that the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution gave rise to unprecedented opportunities and despite temporary limitations greater opportunities lie ahead if we but steer true our course guided by the doctrines which made our country great and peerless. Must we not then be appreciative of the importance of the duties of the public-school teacher in her present-day relation to her pupil? The teacher's responsibility has enlarged, her position has become exalted; upon her depends in great measure the future stability of the Government.

Even before world unrest became so intense, the growing importance of the responsibility of the teacher toward the child and consequently to the Nation came to be realized in various sections of our country. As early as 1921 three States of the Union passed laws requiring teachers to take an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. They were Colorado, Oklahoma, South Dakota. In the same year Oregon demanded an oath to support its State constitution, and its teachers were to teach by precept and example "reverence for law and order and undivided allegiance to the Government of our country, the United States of America." Such law, however, did not provide for a direct oath to support the Federal Constitution.

In 1928 West Virginia by statute imparted to its teachers the duty to swear allegiance to the United States Constitution.

Florida, in 1925, enacted a similar law, and in 1929 Indiana followed. The next year, 1930, Ohio was included in the list.

The subsequent course of events gave impetus to the movement, for in 1931 five more States were added. They were California, Michigan, Montana, North Dakota, and Washington.

In 1932 South Carolina required applicants for teachers' certificates to satisfy the examining power of their loyalty to the United States Constitution, but its law does not provide for an oath of support.

Some States authorize school boards or officials to impose any qualifications upon teachers they may deem proper, which may presumably cover the power to require an oath of allegiance. Very few of the States, however, ask their teachers for such oath. None is mandatory in New Jersey, for instance, although in 1928 the legislature passed a law providing that all permanent teachers employed in the State be citizens of the United States.

The District of Columbia, it is important to mention, by a ruling of the Commissioners on June 7, 1902, pursuant to the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, laid down the requirement that teachers of the District take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and on March 7, 1917, adopted a new form of oath now administered.

The problem of communism in our high schools, particularly among girls, is becoming increasingly difficult and alarming. It must be banished. The teacher's position has been exalted to the point where it involves the very lifeblood of our civilization. The teacher has become the keeper of the Constitution. All teachers, especially those of the larger cities where communism is rampant, should welcome the privilege of attaching to their trust the pledge of allegiance to American doctrines. The teachers' oath, far from impugning disloyalty, will impress indelibly upon the Nation the loyalty and fidelity required in the discharge of the arduous and sacrificial responsibility which, alas, is theirs.

A MIDWESTERN APPROACH TO THE SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have extended in the RECORD a radio speech made by Hon. KARL STEFAN, a Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the leave granted to me, I desire to insert herewith, as an extension of my remarks, a radio address by Hon. KARL STEFAN, of the Third Congressional District of Nebraska, delivered over the Columbia network, January 3, 1935.

To be allowed on this historic occasion to talk to the people of the United States is a great honor. We are today thinking for the safety and security of our Nation.

I believe we are here to help save this great Republic and to help our President carry out the marching orders given to him by the people at the last election.

As the Seventy-fourth Congress opens, we find the Congressmen and Senators assembled with various ideas and various plans—all based on the belief that these ideas and plans will help win this war on depression.

While the city of Washington displays an atmosphere of prosperity and of a boom town, out where I come from—the great State of Nebraska—we know there is a depression. I represent the third district, which normally is the richest agricultural district in the world. Nearly 300,000 people live in that district. There are 35,409 farms in those 22 counties. The farmers out there are broke because the drought killed their crops. The people out there are not radical people. They are producers of the food you eat. They are workers, descendants of the pioneers who settled the country, driving out there in covered wagons drawn by ox teams. Normally it is the Nation's bread basket. That basket is empty today.

You people here in this boom town of Washington do not realize the conditions out there. Pigs are sold by the dozen—35 cents a dozen there—because there is not a kernel of corn for the animals to eat. But when our farmers go to town to buy a meal in a restaurant, it costs them seven pigs for a pork supper. And talking about pork suppers, the prices of things we eat in Washington are unusually high compared with the prices paid for foodstuffs in other States. Pork chops cost 40 cents a pound at several places in Washington. That will give you some idea of how many pigs a pork supper would cost a Nebraska farmer in Washington today. To qualify this statement I wish to point out to you the pitiful condition of farmers who are endeavoring to make a livelihood at raising pigs in my district. For one illustration, a farmer named Mayhew, of Norfolk, Nebr., took 35 pigs to the Sioux City livestock market on October 17, 1934. The net weight of these pigs was 1,620 pounds. He received a price of 1 cent per pound, or a total of $16.20. His expenses included yardage, $4.90; meat board fund, 5 cents; insurance, 9 cents; inspection, 35 cents; and the commission house collected $8.75; or a total expense of $14.14. This farmer was given a check for $2.06. He also handed me a slip containing other expenses which he did not figure in, and he figured it out by the number of pigs which each item cost him instead of dollars and cents. He figured that it cost him 6¾ pigs to take that load of pigs across the toll bridge from the Nebraska to the Iowa side, and it cost him 6¾ pigs to come back across that bridge, but he did not have the pigs any more.

This farmer was hungry, and he went into a restaurant to buy himself something to eat. He ordered a roast-pork supper, and he figured it cost him seven pigs for that roast-pork supper. This gives you some idea of the plight of the Nebraska farmers who today are endeavoring to eke out a living by raising pigs. The hog has been the mortgage lifter in Nebraska for several years. That is not true today, because it is not profitable to feed corn to pigs today because the price of corn has been raised to such a high amount. Corn is being held in some parts of Nebraska for as much as $1.25 a bushel. The Government will not lend money to farmers on these small pigs, because it is not profitable to feed the pigs with this high-priced feed, and as a result there is no market for the little pigs.

I am the only Republican Congressman in Nebraska. Senator NORRIS is the Republican Senator from that State, and we are proud of him. Nebraska's is the only entirely new delegation in the Seventy-fourth Congress.

You know Nebraska is playing a great part in this Congress. It was our own Senator NORRIS, who put the twentieth amendment through Congress. Until that amendment was ratified, a Congress elected in November did not meet in regular session for 13 months. As it is today, we bring the lawmakers in closer touch with the voters. The legislators are not so apt to forget their campaign promises made to the people they now represent.

Speaking as a progressive Republican, I feel that the great Democratic majority in Congress knows the forces that created this majority and that this force can also destroy that majority—the American people. This force includes the 10 million of unemployed, the 20 million on relief, the million young men and women out of our great educational institutions who are walking the streets looking for a job, the 35,000 young men who come of age every month with no job or hope of even marriage. This is the force which this modern Congress must take into consideration, and this is the force which is giving orders today. This force has given us orders for solid recovery. I believe the leaders in this Congress know this.

This Congress will make this winter a turning point in our history. So far as I can see, we are going to follow the President, as the American people are following him. The old two-party systems are wrecked. It was not a question of Democrats or Republicans in our State. It was a marching order to follow the President in winning this war on the depression. There is a lot of talk about wild men in Congress—and Congress will run wild if the American people so will it; and Congress will take the lead away from the President if the demands of the people for adequate relief are unanswered.

You people who are listening to this address no doubt wonder what changes Congress will propose for permanent relief. The big questions I suggest that you watch are:

The demand for immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus.

The permanent program for public works, housing, etc.

Unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, old-age insurance, sickness insurance, etc.

The central bank.

The Frazier-Lemke finance bill.

And do not fail to watch how Congress fights on the proposed gag rule which would require about 218 signers instead of 145 to take a bill out of committee and bring it before Congress.

The rule to which I refer and which I urge that you watch closely and see what action Congress takes is the discharge rule, and those who have been in Congress a long time and those who have read the history of this rule have learned that it was originally adopted back in 1910 for the purpose of taking away from the Speaker some power to recognize the individual Members of the House to bring up legislation as they saw fit and to prevent Members from bringing up legislation he did not want to have brought up. As many progressives view this situation today, they feel that the majority has sufficient majority to do what it wishes in Congress and that the minority has practically no power.

Therefore they feel that this gag rule—which they predict will be passed by this House—will mean that Congressmen who have certain legislation that they wish to bring on the floor of the House will not be able to do so unless they have the approval of the administration and Cabinet members. In other words, many believe that this gag rule puts a powerful weapon in the hands of a few to the disadvantage of many, and that the voice of the people through certain proposed legislation will not be given a hearing on the floor of the House of Representatives. It is a gag rule which is not popular with the progressive-thinking people of our country who wish important legislation to be brought to the attention of the entire House rather than be smothered in some committee. It is a gag rule of which both Republicans and Democrats are guilty, and many Representatives are here today who have made certain promises regarding certain legislation they would bring before the attention of the House who may find their bills locked up in committee rooms. It means that today a Congressman who has a bill in some committee will have to secure the signatures of 218 Members of the House, or a majority, before that bill can come out of committee. To many of us who are opposed to gag rules it is an aim to defeat the immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus, to defeat such bills as the Townsend old-age pension plan, the Frazier-Lemke finance bill, the central bank plan, and many other progressive measures which are being discussed by some of the legislators, and in which the people of the United States are very much interested.

As the only practical radio man in Congress, I am very happy to have the opportunity to address you today. I am interested in better conditions on the farms, because the district I represent depends entirely on the farmer, and the business man in that district realizes that the farmer is his potential customer—his only customer—and the economic condition of the farmer in that district must be improved if the business in the towns is to continue to grow. The radio people may be interested to know that this district, containing 22 normally rich counties, has a population of 229,632; that there are 36,123 radio sets in that district. There are 35,409 farms in my district, and each of these farms is stocked with an average of $4,700 worth of livestock and farm products, a large portion of which is sold each year, besides providing a living for the family. The population is 12 to the square mile, and there has been an automobile for each family. Conditions there are different than a few years ago because of the drought. There is a general exodus of farmers to the towns to seek relief for charity. In some counties livestock is starving because there is no feed. It is for that reason that one of my first acts in Congress will be to introduce a bill asking that the President name a commission to study the farm dollar.

Great statesmen, including our own Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, are in favor of an honest farm dollar, and many of them want a definite plan. I have several plans for a farm dollar, but I believe we would be making a mistake to base a campaign on any particular plan. When one favors a specific plan, we divide the ranks of those who are agreed it should be done. So, I will introduce my bill asking for the appointment of a farm-dollar commission to study all possible plans, and recommend the one which would best accomplish the purpose. What I mean by a farmers' dollar is the ratio, it being the price farmers receive for items they produce and the price they have to pay for the items they want to buy. Back in 1920, the farmers' dollar was worth $1.06. Since then it has been below par. Even in the good times of 1929 the farmers' dollar was worth 91 cents, and the farmer was doing business under a handicap. I believe that if you would bring the farmers' dollar back to 100 cents, he will start buying many things he needs, such as paint, fencing, roofing, farm machinery, and many other items too numerous to mention. I believe that would do more to start factories and reduce unemployment than any other one thing which could be devised. For years the farmer has been doing business with depreciated currency, and I want to see his money have just as much purchasing power as that of everybody else. What I really mean is that when the farmer digs a dollar's worth of produce out of the ground, he should be able to go to town and buy a dollar's worth of merchandise.

I told you that we have over 35,000 farms in our district. Each one of these farms represents a business, invoicing an average of $4,700 each. These farmers are demanding a fair return on investment. Many small businesses with a few hundred dollars invested are today taking in more money than the farmer who has invested in his business many thousands of dollars. The big railroad corporations, power corporations, and others are asking a fair return on investment. Labor is asking for a minimum wage and minimum working hours. There is nothing in the program for a fair return on investment for the farmer. Newspapers indicate that the President and the Agriculture Department feel that the farmer's share of the national income is rising. That may be true in some localities where crops have been abundant, but out in my part of Nebraska where there have been no crops because of the drought, that is not true. Farmers who raised some crops this year profited by the misfortune of farmers in our district. In other words, the drought has accomplished more to increase prices of farm products than any other thing.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 8, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

98. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules and lists of papers, documents, etc., in the files of the Treasury Department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

99. A letter from the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting the Forty-eighth Annual Report of the Commission (H. Doc. No. 23); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

103. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a list of suits arising under the act of March 9, 1920 (41 Stat. 525), authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty involving merchant vessels, in which final decrees were entered against the United States, exclusive of cases on appeal; to the Committee on Claims.

104. A letter from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, transmitting the annual report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934 (H. Doc. No. 13); to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and ordered to be printed.

105. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a list of suits arising under the Public Vessel Act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1112), in which final decrees were entered, exclusive of cases on appeal; to the Committee on Claims.

106. A letter from Attorney General, transmitting the annual report of the Department of Justice for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934 (H. Doc. No. 10); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

107. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting the delinquency report for 1934; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

108. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934 (H. Doc. No. 6); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

109. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting five supplemental estimates of appropriation for the fiscal year 1935 (H. Doc. No. 41); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

110. A letter from Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitting (1) a letter from the administrative assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury submitting reports for the fiscal year 1934 of vessels and vehicles forfeited to the United States for violation of the customs and prohibition laws; (2) a list of persons employed in the Procurement Division, Public Works branch, Treasury Department, and paid from the appropriation, "General expenses of public buildings", during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934; and (3) a letter from the administrative assistant to the Attorney General submitting a report of vessels and vehicles acquired under the act of March 3, 1925, as amended, during the period beginning July 1, 1933, and ending May 10, 1934; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

111. A letter from the administrative assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a combined statement of the receipts and expenditures, balances, etc., of the Government during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934 (H. Doc. No. 42); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

112. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting reports of the Department on (1) Federal-aid road work, (2) forest roads and trails, (3) sale of waste paper; to the Committee on Roads.

113. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report and recommendation concerning the claim of Elda Geer against the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

114. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting report and recommendation concerning the claims of Sanford A. McAlister and Eliza L. McAlister against the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

115. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report and recommendation concerning the claim of the West India Oil Co. against the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

116. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting report and recommendation concerning the claim of Dr. George W. Ritchey against the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Eternal and loving God, we rejoice that we have a bountiful Heavenly Father upon earth whose greater pleasure is to give than to withhold. With joy and dignity may we arise, conscious of that spiritual nature with which we are endowed. Impress us that life is more than a livelihood, meant of God and full of promise forever. In Thy supremacy of love do Thou refresh our distinguished brother and Member who is ill. Almighty God, spare our country from the casualties of disorder and continue to bless those historical institutions which stand as the traditional monuments of a free and representative people. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the legislative day of Thursday, January 3, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (S. Res. 14):

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be notified of the election of Hon. KEY PITTMAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, as President of the Senate pro tempore.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. HARRISON and Mr. COUZENS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration of the following resolution and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 38

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Appropriations, to wit: GEORGE W. JOHNSON, of West Virginia, and JAMES G. SCRUGHAM, of Nevada.

The resolution was agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE REAL ESTATE BONDHOLDERS' REORGANIZATION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 39

Resolved, That the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations of the Seventy-third Congress is authorized as a committee, by subcommittee or otherwise, to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 412 of the Seventy-third Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations by House Resolution 412 of the Seventy-third Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman from New York would give us a little explanation of this resolution. For instance, is a definite date provided on which the committee shall report to the House?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is the committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is chairman, and, incidentally, of which I am vice chairman. At the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] I am presenting this resolution to continue the life of this committee during this Congress.

The work involved is tremendous, and, of course, revolves around the real-estate bonds that have been issued throughout the country, of which there are now outstanding about $8,000,000,000. The investigation of the committee today shows that these bonds are held by about 3,000,000 of the poorer class and by small estates. It is estimated that never will there be recovered more than $4,000,000,000 for these people out of this collapse. In other words, it is a worse situation than that caused by the collapse of the stock exchange.

Mr. SNELL. How much has the committee spent already?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The committee has spent to date the huge sum of $15,000, although it could have employed profitably many times this amount. To give the gentleman an example, in New York we have no lawyer and no accountant on the pay roll. In New York City alone it was necessary to secure the gratuitous service of at least 20 of the best accountants and about a dozen of the best lawyers.

To this date the $15,000 in its expenditure has saved, it is estimated roughly, millions of dollars to these people. To cite one example, in the case of one reorganization in New York, the reorganization committee had applied to the court for fees to the committee and counsel of about $750,000. When our committee exposed part of the situation in New York, the court reduced the fees to $260,000.

Mr. SNELL. That is pretty good.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There are many similar instances in which we saved money to the bondholders. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], a minority member of the committee, can vouch for the fact that we have only scratched the surface of this gigantic fraud. We have exposed some fraud, collusion, and dishonesty which will probably shortly go to the Department of Justice.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think the committee should make a partial report?

Mr. O'CONNOR. A partial report will be made very soon, as I understand it.

Mr. SNELL. How much more money is it expected will be necessary to complete the committee's work?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no idea how much more money will be required. To get more money, of course, we shall have to go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to a member of the special committee.

Mr. O'MALLEY. In addition to reducing fees and saving money to these people, the committee has turned over to the Bureau of Internal Revenue information and evidence which will enable that Bureau to collect at least $1,000,000 in taxes. This is one thing I know has been brought about by the expenditure of this $15,000.

Mr. SNELL. If the committee can help the people of New York we are very much interested.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We are helping them. The efforts of the committee from the start have been very much worth while.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, merely to make an observation. I think the expenditure of this money has been one of the best expenditures made. We now know the facts about fraudulent securities; everybody knows now just what has been going on for several years.

In Chicago, for instance, they have been selling so-called "gold real-estate bonds" on apartment houses to credulous people all over the United States; poor people, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] states; and then these fraudulent manipulators, after getting the people's money, have gone into the hands of a receiver and placed their assets beyond the reach of the creditors, squandering same in outrageous fees to receivers and attorneys. People thus defrauded all over the country are still holding their worthless gold bonds.

As I say, we already know the facts about this fraud that has been going on all over the United States with respect to these securities, but the question is, What do we intend to do about it? Do we intend merely to gather more facts and learn of more frauds, or do we intend to stop the practice through proper legislation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is just what we intend to do, but at the present time we have not sufficient facts.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman's committee so far has done splendid work, and I commend him and our good friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for their efforts.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We need considerably more time in which to complete the work. We have in mind, tentatively, certain legislation which we shall propose.

The resolution was agreed to.

PANAMA REFINING CO. AND AMAZON PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House at the last session of Congress, of which I was chairman, submitted its hearings and a report just prior to the convening of the present Congress. In the report the committee took the position that definite legislation should not be recommended or proposed at that time, but that it would be better to await the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Amazon and Panama cases which were pending at that time.

This litigation from the State of Texas, which was brought directly to the Court for decision, affected a very vital section of the oil code and the Recovery Act pertaining to petroleum. A decision by the Supreme Court in these cases was handed down yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with those decisions, the committee feels that a recent decision by Judge McCormick in the case of the United States of America against Wilshire Oil Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, delivered on December 31, 1934, presents very valuable information on the legal phases of this intricate problem. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes, the dissenting opinion of Justice Cardozo, and the opinion of Judge McCormick be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 135 and 260—October term, 1934

135, PANAMA REFINING COMPANY ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. A. D. RYAN, S. D. BENNETT, AND J. HOWARD MARSHALL—260, AMAZON PETROLEUM CORPORATION, BARNEY COCKBURN, E. J. BOASE ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. ARCHIE D. RYAN, S. D. BENNETT, AND PHIL E. BAER—ON WRITS OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court.

On July 11, 1933, the President, by Executive order, prohibited "the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted to be produced or withdrawn from storage by any State law or valid regulation or order prescribed thereunder by any board, commission, officer, or other duly authorized agency of a State."[1] This action was based on section 9 (c) of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 195, 200; 15 U. S. C., title I, sec. 709 (c)). That section provides:

"SEC. 9. * * *

"(c) The President is authorized to prohibit the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted to be produced or withdrawn from storage by any State law or valid regulation or order prescribed thereunder by any board, commission, officer, or other duly authorized agency of a State. Any violation of any order of the President issued under the provisions of this subsection shall be punishable by fine of not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment for not to exceed 6 months, or both."

On July 14, 1933, the President, by Executive order, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to exercise all the powers vested in the President "for the purpose of enforcing section 9 (c) of said act and said order" of July 11, 1933, "including full authority to designate and appoint such agents and to set up such boards and agencies as he may see fit, and to promulgate such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary."[2] That order was made under section 10 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 200. 15 U. S. C., 710 (a), authorizing the President "to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes" of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act and providing that "any violation of any such rule or regulation shall be punishable by fine of not to exceed $500, or imprisonment for not to exceed 6 months, or both."

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Prohibition of transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the priducts thereof unlawfully produced or withdrawn from storage

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the act of Congress entitled "An act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted to be produced or withdrawn from storage by any State law or valid regulation or order prescribed thereunder, by any board, commission, officer, or other duly authorized agency of a State, is hereby prohibited.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1933.

[2] The Executive order of July 14, 1933, is as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Prohibition of transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof unlawfully produced or withdrawn from storage

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the act of Congress entitled "An act to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), in order to effectuate the intent and purpose of the Congress as expressed in section 9 (c) thereof, and for the purpose of securing the enforcement of my order of July 11, 1933, issued pursuant to said act, I hereby authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exercise all the powers vested in me for the purpose of enforcing section 9 (c) of said act and said order, including full authority to designate and appoint such agents and to set up such boards and agencies as he may see fit, and to promulgate such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 14, 1933.

On July 15, 1933, the Secretary of the Interior issued regulations to carry out the President's orders of July 11 and 14, 1933. These regulations were amended by orders of July 25, 1933, and August 21, 1933, prior to the commencement of these suits. Regulation IV provided, in substance, that every producer of petroleum should file a monthly statement under oath, beginning August 15, 1933, with the Division of Investigations of the Department of the Interior giving information with respect to the residence and post-office address of the producer, the location of his producing properties and wells, the allowable production as prescribed by State authority, the amount of daily production, all deliveries of petroleum, and declaring that no part of the petroleum or products produced and shipped had been produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted by State authority. Regulation V required every purchaser, shipper (other than a producer), and refiner of petroleum, including processors, similarly to file a monthly statement under oath, giving information as to residence and post-office address, the place and date of receipt, the parties from whom and the amount of petroleum received and the amount held in storage, the disposition of the petroleum, particulars as to deliveries, and declaring, to the best of the affiant's information and belief, that none of the petroleum so handled had been produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of that allowed by State authority. Regulation VII provided that all persons embraced within the terms of section 9 (c) of the act, and the Executive orders and regulations issued thereunder, should keep "available for inspection by the Division of Investigations of the Department of the Interior adequate books and records of all transactions involving the production and transportation of petroleum and the products thereof."

On August 19, 1933, the President, by Executive order, stating that his action was taken under title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved a "code of fair competition for the petroleum industry."[3] By a further Executive order of August 28, 1933, the President designated the Secretary of the Interior as Administrator, and the Department of the Interior as the Federal agency, to exercise on behalf of the President all the powers vested in him under that act and code. Section 3 (f) of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act provides that when a code of fair competition has been approved or prescribed by the President under that title "any violation of any provision thereof in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or not more than $500 for each offense, each day of said violation to be deemed a separate offense."

This "petroleum code" (in its original form and as officially printed) provided in section 3 of article III relating to "production" for estimates of "required production of crude oil to balance consumer demand for petroleum products" to be made at intervals by the Federal agency. This "required production" was to be "equitably allocated" among the several States. These estimates and allocations, when approved by the President, were to be deemed to be "the net reasonable market demand" and the allocations were to be recommended "as the operating schedules for the producing States and for the industry." By section 4 of article III the subdivision, with respect to producing properties, of the production allocated to each State was to be made within the State. The second paragraph of that section further provided:

"If any subdivision into quotas of production allocated to any State shall be made within a State, any production by any person, as person is defined in article I, section 3, of this code in excess of any such quota assigned to him, shall be deemed an unfair trade practice and in violation of this code."

By an Executive order of September 13, 1933, modifying certain provisions of the petroleum code, this second paragraph of section 4 of article III was eliminated. It was reinstated by Executive order of September 25, 1934.

These suits were brought in October 1933.

In no. 135, the Panama Refining Co., as owner of an oil-refining plant in Texas, and its coplaintiff, a producer having oil and gas

[3] The Executive order of August 19, 1933, is as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Code of fair competition for the petroleum industry

An application having been duly made pursuant to and in full compliance with the provisions of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, for my approval of a code of fair competition for the petroleum industry, and hearings having been held thereon and the Administrator having rendered his report, together with his recommendations and findings with respect thereto, and the Administrator having found that the said code of fair competition complies in all respects with the pertinent provisions of title I of said act and that the requirements of clauses (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of section 3 of the said act have been met:

Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, pursuant to the authority vested in me by title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, and otherwise, do adopt and approve the report, recommendations, and findings of the Administrator and do order that the said code of fair competition be, and it is hereby, approved.

leases in Texas, sued to restrain the defendants, who were Federal officials, from enforcing regulations IV, V, and VII, prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior under section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Plaintiffs attacked the validity of section 9 (c) as an unconstitutional delegation to the President of legislative power and as transcending the authority of the Congress under the commerce clause. The regulations, and the attempts to enforce them by coming upon the properties of the plaintiffs, gaging their tanks, digging up pipe lines, and otherwise, were also assailed under the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution.

In no. 260, the Amazon Petroleum Corporation and its coplaintiffs, all being oil producers in Texas and owning separate properties, sued to enjoin the railroad commission of that State, its members and other State officers, and the other defendants who were Federal officials, from enforcing the State and Federal restrictions upon the production and disposition of oil. The bill alleged that the legislation of the State and the orders of its commission in curtailing production violated the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. As to the Federal requirements, the bill not only attacked section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior thereunder, upon substantially the same grounds as those set forth in the bill of the Panama Refining Co., but also challenged the validity of provisions of the petroleum code. While a number of these provisions were set out in the bill, the contest on the trial related to the limitation of production through the allocation of quotas pursuant to section 4 of article III of the code.

As the case involved the constitutional validity of orders of the State commission and an interlocutory injunction was sought, a court of three judges was convened under section 266 of the Judicial Code (28 U. S. C. 380). That court decided that the cause of action against the Federal officials was not one within section 266 but was for the consideration of the district judge alone. The parties agreed that the causes of action should be severed and that each cause should be submitted to the tribunal having jurisdiction of it. Hearing was had both on the applications for interlocutory injunction and upon the merits. The court of three judges, sustaining the State orders, denied injunction and dismissed the bill as against the State authorities (5 F. Supp. 633, 634, 639).

In both cases against the Federal officials, that of the Panama Refining Co. and that of the Amazon Petroleum Corporation, heard by the district judge, a permanent injunction was granted (5 F. Supp. 639). In the case of the Amazon Petroleum Corporation the court specifically enjoined the defendants from enforcing section 4 of article III of the petroleum code, both plaintiffs and defendants, and the court, being unaware of the amendment of September 13, 1933.

The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the decrees against the Federal officials and directed that the bills be dismissed (71 F. (2d) 1, 8). The cases come here on writs of certiorari granted on October 8, 1934.

First. The controversy with respect to the provision of section 4 of article III of the petroleum code was initiated and proceeded in the courts below upon a false assumption. That assumption was that this section still contained the paragraph (eliminated by the Executive order of Sept. 13, 1933) by which production in excess of assigned quotas was made an unfair practice and a violation of the code. Whatever the cause of the failure to give appropriate public notice of the change in the section, with the result that the persons affected, the prosecuting authorities and the courts, were alike ignorant of the alteration, the fact is that the attack in this respect was upon a provision which did not exist. The Government's announcement that, by reason of the elimination of this paragraph, the Government "cannot, and therefore it does not intend to, prosecute petitioners or other producers of oil in Texas, criminally or otherwise, for exceeding, at any time prior to September 25, 1934, the quotas of production assigned to them under the laws of Texas", but that if "petitioners, or other producers, produce in excess of such quotas after September 25, 1934, the Government intends to prosecute them", cannot avail to import into the present case the amended provision of that date.[4] The case is not one where a subsequent law is applicable to a pending suit and controls its disposition.[5] When this suit was brought, and when it was heard, there was no cause of action for the injunction sought with respect to the provision of section 4 of article III of the code; as to that, there was no basis for real controversy. (See California v. San Pablo, 149 U. S. 308, 314; United States v. Alaska Steamship Co., 253 U. S. 113, 116; Barker Co. v. Painters' Union, 281 U. S. 462.) If the Government undertakes to enforce the new provision, the petitioners, as well as others, will have an opportunity to present their grievance, which can then be considered, as it should be, in the light of the facts as they will then appear.

For this reason we pass to the other questions presented and we express no opinion as to the interpretation or validity of the provisions of the petroleum code.

Second. Regulations IV, V, and VII, issued by the Secretary of the Interior prior to these suits, have since been amended. But the amended regulations continue substantially the earlier requirements and expand them. They present the same constitutional questions, and the cases as to these are not moot (Southern Pacific Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U. S. 433, 452; Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U. S. 498, 514–516; McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, 181, 182).

The original regulations of July 15, 1933, as amended July 25, 1933, and August 21, 1933, were issued to enforce the Executive orders of July 11 and July 14, 1933. The Executive order of July 11, 1933, was made under section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and the Executive order of July 14, 1933, under section 10 (a) of that act, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate regulations, was for the purpose of enforcing section 9 (c), and the Executive order of July 11, 1933. The amended regulations have been issued for the same purpose. The fundamental question as to these regulations thus turns upon the validity of section 9 (c) and the Executive orders to carry it out.

Third. The statute provides that any violation of any order of the President issued under section 9 (c) shall be punishable by fine of not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment for not to exceed 6 months, or both. We think that these penalties would attach to each violation, and in this view the plaintiffs were entitled to invoke the equitable jurisdiction to restrain enforcement, if the statute and the Executive orders were found to be invalid (Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 620, 621; Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 214–216; Hygrade Provision Co. v. Sherman, 266 U. S. 497, 499, 500).

Fourth. Section 9 (c) is assailed upon the ground that it is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The section purports to authorize the President to pass a prohibitory law. The subject to which this authority relates is defined. It is the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and petroleum products which are produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted by State authority. Assuming for the present purpose, without deciding, that the Congress has power to interdict the transportation of that excess in interstate and foreign commerce, the question whether that transportation shall be prohibited by law is obviously one of legislative policy. Accordingly, we look to the statute to see whether the Congress has declared a policy with respect to that subject; whether the Congress has set up a standard for the President's action; whether the Congress has required any finding by the President in the exercise of the authority to enact the prohibition.

Section 9 (c) is brief and unambiguous. It does not attempt to control the production of petroleum and petroleum products within a State. It does not seek to lay down rules for the guidance of State legislatures or State officers. It leaves to the States and to their constituted authorities the determination of what production shall be permitted. It does not qualify the President's authority by reference to the basis, or extent, of the State's limitation of production. Section 9 (c) does not state whether, or in what circumstances or under what conditions the President is to prohibit the transportation of the amount of petroleum or petroleum products produced in excess of the State's permission. It establishes no criterion to govern the President's course. It does not require any finding by the President as a condition of his action. The Congress in section 9 (c) thus declares no policy as to the transportation of the excess production. So far as this section is concerned, it gives to the President an unlimited authority to determine the policy and to lay down the prohibition, or not to lay it down, as he may see fit. And disobedience to his order is made a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment.

We examine the context to ascertain if it furnishes a declaration of policy or a standard of action, which can be deemed to relate to the subject of section 9 (c), and thus to imply what is not there expressed. It is important to note that section 9 is headed "Oil Regulation"—that is, section 9 is the part of the National Industrial Recovery Act which particularly deals with that subject matter. But the other provisions of section 9 afford no ground for implying a limitation of the broad grant of authority in section 9 (c). Thus section 9 (a) authorizes the President to initiate before the Interstate Commerce Commission "proceedings necessary to prescribe regulations to control the operations of oil pipe lines and to fix reasonable compensatory rates for the transportation of petroleum and its products by pipe lines", and the Interstate Commerce Commission is to grant preference "to the hearings and determination of such cases." Section 9 (b) authorizes the President to institute proceedings "to divorce from any holding company any pipe-line company controlled by such holding company which pipe-line company by unfair practices or by exorbitant rates in the transportation of petroleum or its products tends to create a monopoly." It will be observed that each of these provisions contains restrictive clauses as to their respective subjects. Neither relates to the subject of section 9 (c).

[4] The Government states that although the second paragraph of sec. 4 of art. III was a part of the code for a short period prior to Sept. 13, 1933, no legal basis exists for prosecution for production in Texas during that period.

[5] See United States v. The Schooner Peggy, 1 Cranch. 103, 109, 110; Dinsmore v. Southern Express Co., 183 U. S. 115, 120; Crozier v. Krupp, 224 U. S. 290, 302; Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Rwy. Co. v. Dennis, 224 U. S. 503, 507; Watts v. Unione Austriaca, 248 U. S. 9, 21; Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering, 254 U. S. 443, 464; American Foundries v. Tri-City Council, 257 U. S. 184, 201; Texas Company v. Brown, 258 U. S. 466, 474.

We turn to the other provisions of title I of the act. The first section is a "declaration of policy."[6] It declares that a national emergency exists "which is productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce, affects public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people." It is declared to be the policy of Congress "to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof"; "to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups"; "to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision"; "to eliminate unfair competition practices, to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required), to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources."

This general outline of policy contains nothing as to the circumstances or conditions in which transportation of petroleum or petroleum products should be prohibited; nothing as to the policy of prohibiting, or not prohibiting, the transportation of production exceeding what the States allow. The general policy declared is "to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce." As to production, the section lays down no policy of limitation. It favors the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries. It speaks, parenthetically, of a possible temporary restriction of production, but of what, or in what circumstances, it gives no suggestion. The section also speaks in general terms of the conservation of natural resources but it prescribes no policy for the achievement of that end. It is manifest that this broad outline is simply an introduction of the act, leaving the legislative policy as to particular subjects to be declared and defined, if at all, by the subsequent sections.

It is no answer to insist that deleterious consequences follow the transportation of "hot oil"—oil exceeding State allowances. The Congress did not prohibit that transportation. The Congress did not undertake to say that the transportation of "hot oil" was injurious. The Congress did not say that transportation of that oil was "unfair competition." The Congress did not declare in what circumstances that transportation should be forbidden, or require the President to make any determination as to any facts or circumstances. Among the numerous and diverse objectives broadly stated, the President was not required to choose. The President was not required to ascertain and proclaim the conditions prevailing in the industry which made the prohibition necessary. The Congress left the matter to the President without standard or rule, to be dealt with as he pleased. The effort by ingenious and diligent construction to supply a criterion still permits such a breadth of authorized action as essentially to commit to the President the functions of a legislature rather than those of an executive or administrative officer executing a declared legislative policy. We find nothing in section 1 which limits or controls the authority conferred by section 9 (c).

We pass to the other sections of the act. Section 2 relates to administrative agencies which may be constituted. Section 3 provides for the approval by the President of "codes" for trades or industries. These are to be codes of "fair competition" and the authority is based upon certain express conditions which require findings by the President. Action under section 9 (c) is not made to depend on the formulation of a code under section 3. In fact, the President's action under section 9 (c) was taken more than a month before a petroleum code was approved. Subdivision (e) of section 3 authorizes the President, on his own motion or upon complaint, as stated, in case any article is being imported into the United States "in substantial quantities or increasing ratio to domestic production of any competitive article", under such conditions as to endanger the maintenance of a code or agreement under title I, to cause an immediate investigation by the Tariff Commission. The authority of the President to act, after such investigation, is conditioned upon a finding by him of the existence of the underlying facts, and he may permit entry of the articles concerned upon such conditions and with such limitations as he shall find it necessary to prescribe in order that the entry shall not tend to render the code or agreement ineffective. Section 4 relates to agreements and licenses for the purposes stated. Section 5 refers to the application of the antitrust laws. Sections 6 and 7 impose limitations upon the application of title I, bearing upon trade associations and other organizations and upon the relations between employers and employees. Section 8 contains provisions with respect to the application of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933.

None of these provisions can be deemed to prescribe any limitation of the grant of authority in section 9 (c).

Fifth. The question whether such a delegation of legislative power is permitted by the Constitution is not answered by the argument that it should be assumed that the President has acted, and will act, for what he believes to be the public good. The point is not one of motives but of constitutional authority, for which the best of motives is not a substitute. While the present controversy relates to a delegation to the President, the basic question has a much wider application. If the Congress can make a grant of legislative authority of the sort attempted by section 9 (c), we find nothing in the Constitution which restricts the Congress to the selection of the President as grantee. The Congress may vest the power in the officer of its choice or in a board or commission such as it may select or create for the purpose. Nor, with respect to such a delegation, is the question concerned merely with the transportation of oil, or of oil produced in excess of what the State may allow. If legislative power may thus be vested in the President, or other grantee, as to that excess of production, we see no reason to doubt that it may similarly be vested with respect to the transportation of oil without reference to the State's requirements. That reference simply defines the subject of the prohibition which the President is authorized to enact, or not to enact, as he pleases. And if that legislative power may be given to the President or other grantee, it would seem to follow that such power may similarly be conferred with respect to the transportation of other commodities in interstate commerce with or without reference to State action, thus giving to the grantee of the power the determination of what is a wise policy as to that transportation, and authority to permit or prohibit it, as the person, or board or commission, so chosen, may think desirable. In that view, there would appear to be no ground for denying a similar prerogative of delegation with respect to other subjects of legislation.

The Constitution provides that "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives" (art. I, sec. 1). And the Congress is empowered "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" its general powers (art. I, sec. 8, par. 18). The Congress manifestly is not permitted to abdicate, or to transfer to others, the essential legislative functions with which it is thus vested. Undoubtedly legislation must often be adapted to complex conditions involving a host of details with which the national legislature cannot deal directly. The Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality, which will enable it to perform its function in laying down policies and establishing standards, while leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the legislature is to apply. Without capacity to give authorizations of that sort we should have the anomaly of a legislative power which in many circumstances calling for its exertion would be but a futility. But the constant recognition of the necessity and validity of such provisions, and the wide range of administrative authority which has been developed by means of them, cannot be allowed to obscure the limitations of the authority to delegate, if our constitutional system is to be maintained.

The Court has had frequent occasion to refer to these limitations and to review the course of congressional action. At the very outset, amid the disturbances due to war in Europe, when the national safety was imperiled and our neutrality was disregarded, the Congress passed a series of acts, as a part of which the President was authorized, in stated circumstances, to lay and revoke embargoes, to give permits for the exportation of arms and military stores, to remit and discontinue the restraints and prohibitions imposed by acts suspending commercial intercourse with certain countries, and to permit or interdict the entrance into waters of the United States of armed vessels belonging to foreign nations.[7] These early acts were not subject to judicial decision and, apart from that, they afford no adequate basis for a conclusion that the Congress assumed that it possessed an unqualified power of delegation. They were inspired by the vexations of American commerce through the hostile enterprises of the belligerent powers,[8] they were directed to the effective execution of policies repeatedly declared by the Congress, and they confided to the President, for the purposes and under the conditions stated,

[6] The text of sec. 1 is as follows:

"SECTION 1. A national emergency productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce, affects the public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people, is hereby declared to exist. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof; and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required), to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources."

an authority which was cognate to the conduct by him of the foreign relations of the Government.[9]

The first case relating to an authorization of this description was that of The Brig Aurora (7 Cranch. 382). The cargo of that vessel had been condemned as having been imported from Great Britain in violation of the nonintercourse act of March 1, 1809 (2 Stat. 528). That act expired on May 1, 1810,[10] when Congress passed another act (2 Stat. 605, 606) providing that in case either Great Britain or France before March 3, 1811, "shall * * * so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President of the United States shall declare by proclamation, and if the other nation shall not within 3 months thereafter so revoke or modify her edicts in like manner", then, with respect to that nation, as stated, the provisions of the act of 1809, after 3 months from that proclamation, "shall * * * be revived and have full force and effect." On November 2, 1810, the President issued his proclamation declaring that France had so revoked or modified her edicts, and it was contended that the provisions of the act of 1809, as to the cargo in question, had thus been revived. The Court said that it could see no sufficient reason why the legislature should not exercise its discretion in reviving the act of 1809, "either expressly or conditionally, as their judgment should direct." The provision of that act declaring "that it should continue in force to a certain time and no longer" could not restrict the power of the legislature to extend its operation "without limitation upon the occurrence of any subsequent combination of events." This was a decision, said the Court in Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649, 683) "that it was competent for Congress to make the revival of an act depend upon the proclamation of the President showing the ascertainment by him of the fact that the edicts of certain nations had been so revoked or modified that they did not violate the neutral commerce of the United States."

In Field v. Clark, supra, the Court applied that ruling to the case of "the suspension of an act upon a contingency to be ascertained by the President, and made known by his proclamation." The Court was dealing with section 3 of the act of October 1, 1890 (26 Stat. 567, 612). That section provided that, "with a view to secure reciprocal trade" with countries producing certain articles, "whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied" that the government of any country producing them imposed "duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States" which, in view of the free list established by the act, the President "may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty" to suspend the free introduction of those articles by proclamation to that effect, and that during that suspension the duties specified by the section should be levied. The validity of the provision was challenged as a delegation to the President of legislative power. The Court reviewed the early acts to which we have referred, as well as later statutes considered to be analogous.[11] While sustaining the provision, the Court emphatically declared that the principle that "Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President" is "universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution." The Court found that the act before it was not inconsistent with that principle; that it did not "in any real sense invest the President with the power of legislation." As "the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact", it could not be said "that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws." "He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect" (id., pp. 692, 693). The Court referred with approval to the distinction pointed out by the Supreme Court of Ohio in Cincinnati, Wilmington, etc., Railroad v. Commissioners (1 Ohio St. 88) between "the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law."

Applying that principle, authorizations given by Congress to selected instrumentalities for the purpose of ascertaining the existence of facts to which legislation is directed have constantly been sustained. Moreover, the Congress may not only give such authorizations to determine specific facts but may establish primary standards, devolving upon others the duty to carry out the declared legislative policy; that is, as Chief Justice Marshall expressed it, "to fill up the details" under the general provisions made by the legislature (Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 43). In Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S. 470, 496) the act of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat. 604, 605), was upheld, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of a board of experts, to "establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness for the consumption of all kinds of teas imported into the United States." The Court construed the statute as expressing "the purpose to exclude the lowest grades of tea, whether demonstrably of inferior purity, or unfit for consumption, or presumably so because of their inferior quality." The Congress, the Court said, thus fixed "a primary standard" and committed to the Secretary of the Treasury "the mere executive duty to effectuate the legislative policy declared in the statute." "Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute." (See Red "C" Oil Co. v. North Carolina, 222 U. S. 380, 394.)

Another notable illustration is that of the authority given to the Secretary of War to determine whether bridges and other structures constitute unreasonable obstructions to navigation and to remove such obstructions (act of Mar. 3, 1899, sec. 18, 30 Stat. 1153, 1154). By that statute the Congress declared "a general rule and imposed upon the Secretary of War the duty of ascertaining what particular cases came within the rule" as thus laid down (Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 386; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 193; Philadelphia Company v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 638). Upon this principle rests the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the execution of the declared policy of the Congress in enforcing reasonable rates, in preventing undue preferences and unjust discriminations, in requiring suitable facilities for transportation in interstate commerce, and in exercising other powers held to have been validly conferred (St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281, 287; Intermountain Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 476, 486; Avent v. United States, 266 U. S. 127, 130; N. Y. Central Securities Co. v. United States, 287 U. S. 12, 24, 25). Upon a similar ground the authority given to the President, in appropriate relation to his functions as Commander in Chief, by the Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended by the act of March 28, 1918 (40 Stat. 460), with respect to the disposition of enemy property, was sustained. "The determination", said the court, "of the terms of sales of enemy properties in the light of facts and conditions from time to time arising in the progress of war was not the making of a law; it was the application of the general rule laid down

[9] Thus, prior to the act of June 4, 1794 (1 Stat. 372), the Congress had laid embargoes, for limited periods, upon vessels in ports of the United States bound to foreign ports. Resolutions of Mar. 26, 1794, and Apr. 18, 1794, 1 Stat. 400, 401. Fearing that the national safety might be endangered, the President, by the act of June 4, 1794, was authorized to lay an embargo, with appropriate regulations, whenever he found "that the public safety shall so require", the authority not to be exercised while the Congress was in session and the embargo to be limited in any case to 15 days after the commencement of the next session. The act of Mar. 3, 1795 (1 Stat. 444), authorizing the President to permit the exportation of arms, etc., was "in cases connected with the security of the commercial interest of the United States and for public purposes only." By the act of June 13, 1798 (1 Stat. 565), commercial intercourse was suspended between the United States and France and its dependencies. The act was to continue only until the end of the next session of Congress and it was provided (sec. 5) that if, before the next session, the Government of France "shall clearly disavow, and shall be found to refrain from the aggressions, depredations, and hostilities" against the vessels and other property of citizens of the United States, and shall acknowledge the neutrality of the United States, "it shall be lawful for the President", "being well ascertained of the premises", to remit and discontinue the prohibitions and restraints imposed by the act and to make proclamation accordingly. The act of Feb. 9, 1799 (1 Stat. 613), further suspended commercial intercourse between the United States and France and its dependencies until Mar. 3, 1800, and gave a similar authority (sec. 4) to the President to remit and discontinue the restraints and prohibitions of the act, "if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States", either with respect to the French Republic or to any place belonging to that Republic, "with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed", and to revoke such order if he found that the interest of the United States so required. The suspension of commercial intercourse was renewed by the act of Feb. 27, 1800 (2 Stat. 7) until Mar. 3, 1801, with a similar provision as to the authority of the President. The act of Mar. 3, 1805 (2 Stat. 339) related to persons committing treason, felony, etc., within the jurisdiction of the United States and taking refuge in foreign armed vessels, and the authority to the President to permit or prevent the entry of such vessels into the waters of the United States (sec. 4) was "in order to prevent insults to the authority of the laws, whereby the peace of the United States with foreign nations may be endangered." by the act" (United States v. Chemical Foundation, 272 U. S. 1, 12).[12]

The provisions of the Radio Act of 1927 (44 Stat. 1162, 1163), providing for assignments of frequencies or wave lengths to various stations, afford another instance. In granting licenses, the Radio Commission is required to act "as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires." In construing this provision, the Court found that the statute itself declared the policy as to "equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception", and that it conferred authority to make allocations and assignments in order to secure, according to stated criteria, an equitable adjustment in the distribution of facilities.[13] The standard set-up was not so indefinite "as to confer an unlimited power" (Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Co., 289 U. S. 266, 279, 285).

So, also, from the beginning of the Government the Congress has conferred upon executive officers the power to make regulations, "not for the government of their departments, but for administering the laws which did govern" (United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 517). Such regulations become indeed binding rules of conduct, but they are valid only as subordinate rules and when found to be within the framework of the policy which the legislature has sufficiently defined. In the case of Grimaud, supra, a regulation made by the Secretary of Agriculture requiring permits for grazing sheep on a forest reserve of lands belonging to the United States was involved. The Court referred to the various acts for the establishment and management of forest reservations and the authorization of rules which would "insure the objects of such reservation"; that is, "to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction." The Court observed that "it was impracticable for Congress to provide general regulations for these various and varying details of management", and that, in authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to meet local conditions, Congress "was merely conferring administrative functions upon an agent, and not delegating to him legislative power" (id., pp. 515, 516). The Court quoted with approval the statement of the principle in Field v. Clark, supra, that the Congress cannot delegate legislative power, and upheld the regulation in question as an administrative rule for the appropriate execution of the policy laid down in the statute. (See Wayman v. Southard, supra; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co., 224 U. S. 194, 214, 215; Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U. S. 366, 389; McKinley v. United States, 249 U. S. 397.)

The applicable considerations were reviewed in Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394), where the Court dealt with the so-called "flexible tariff provision" of the act of September 21, 1922 (42 Stat. 858, 941, 942), and with the authority which it conferred upon the President. The court applied the same principle that permitted the Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, and found that a similar provision was justified for the fixing of customs duties; that is, as the Court said, "If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power. If it is thought wise to vary the customs duties according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, it may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the advisory assistance of a tariff commission appointed under congressional authority." The Court sustained the provision upon the authority of Field v. Clark, supra, repeating with approval what was there said—that "What the President was required to do was merely in execution of the act of Congress" (id., pp. 409–411).

Thus, in every case in which the question has been raised, the Court has recognized that there are limits of delegation which there is no constitutional authority to transcend. We think that section 9 (c) goes beyond those limits. As to the transportation of oil production in excess of State permission, the Congress has declared no policy, has established no standard, has laid down no rule. There is no requirement, no definition of circumstances and conditions in which the transportation is to be allowed or prohibited.

If section 9 (c) were held valid, it would be idle to pretend that anything would be left of limitations upon the power of the Congress to delegate its law-making function. The reasoning of the many decisions we have reviewed would be made vacuous and their distinctions nugatory. Instead of performing its law-making function the Congress could at will and as to such subjects as it chooses transfer that function to the President or other officer or to an administrative body. The question is not of the intrinsic importance of the particular statute before us, but of the constitutional processes of legislation which are an essential part of our system of government.

Sixth. There is another objection to the validity of the prohibition laid down by the Executive order under section 9 (c). The Executive order contains no finding, no statement of the grounds of the President's action in enacting the prohibition. Both section 9 (c) and the Executive order are in notable contrast with historic practice (as shown by many statutes and proclamations we have cited in the margin[14]) by which declarations of policy are made by the Congress and delegations are within the framework of that policy and have relation to facts and conditions to be found and stated by the President in the appropriate exercise of the delegated authority. If it could be said that from the four corners of the statute any possible inference could be drawn of particular circumstances or conditions which were to govern the exercise of the authority conferred, the President could not act validly without having regard to those circumstances and conditions. And findings by him as to the existence of the required basis of his action would be necessary to sustain that action, for otherwise the case would still be one of an unfettered discretion as the qualification of authority would be ineffectual. The point is pertinent in relation to the first section of the National Industrial Recovery Act. We have said that the first section is but a general introduction, that it declares no policy and defines no standard with respect to the transportation which is the subject of section 9 (c). But if from the extremely broad description contained in that section and the widely different matters to which the section refers, it were possible to derive a statement of prerequisites to the President's action under section 9 (c), it would still be necessary for the President to comply with those conditions and to show that compliance as the ground of his prohibition. To hold that he is free to select as he chooses from the many and various objects generally described in the first section, and then to act without making any finding with respect to any object that he does select, and the circumstances properly related to that object, would be in effect to make the conditions inoperative and to invest him with an uncontrolled legislative power.

We are not dealing with action which, appropriately belonging to the executive province, is not the subject of judicial review, or with the presumptions attaching to executive action.[15] To repeat, we are concerned with the question of the delegation of legislative power. If the citizen is to be punished for the crime of violating a legislative order of an executive officer, or of a board or commission, due process of law requires that it shall appear that the order is within the authority of the officer, board, or commission, and if that authority depends on determinations of fact, those determinations must be shown. As the Court said in Wichita Railroad & Light Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (260 U. S. 48, 59): "In creating such an administrative agency the legislature, to prevent its being a pure delegation of legislative power, must enjoin upon it a certain course of procedure and certain rules of decision in the performance of its function. It is a wholesome and necessary principle that such an agency must pursue the procedure and rules enjoined and show a substantial compliance therewith to give validity to its action. When, therefore, such an administrative agency is required as a condition precedent to an order to make a finding of facts, the validity of the order must rest upon the needed finding. If it is lacking, the order is ineffective. It is pressed on us that the lack of an express finding may be supplied by implication and by reference to the averments of the petition invoking the action of the commission. We cannot agree to this." Referring to the ruling in the Wichita case, the Court said in Mahler v. Eby (264 U. S. 32, 44): "We held that the order in that case, made after a hearing and ordering a reduction, was void for lack of the express finding in the order. We put this conclusion not only on the language of the statute but also on general principles of constitutional government." We cannot regard the President as immune from the application of these constitutional principles. When the President is invested with legislative authority as the delegate of Congress in carrying out a declared policy, he necessarily acts under the constitutional restriction applicable to such a delegation.

We see no escape from the conclusion that the Executive orders of July 11, 1933, and July 14, 1933, and the regulations issued by the Secretary of the Interior thereunder, are without constitutional authority.

The decrees of the circuit court of appeals are reversed and the causes are remanded to the district court with direction to modify its decrees in conformity with this opinion so as to grant permanent injunctions restraining the defendants from enforcing those orders and regulations.

It is so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 135 and 260—October Term, 1934

135, PANAMA REFINING CO. ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. A. D. RYAN ET AL., RESPONDENTS—260, AMAZON PETROLEUM CORPORATION ET AL., PETITIONERS, v. ARCHIE D. RYAN ET AL., RESPONDENTS—ON WRITS OF CERTIORARI TO THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

(Jan. 7, 1935)

Mr. Justice Cardozo dissenting:

With all that is said in the opinion of the Court as to the code of fair competition adopted by the President August 16, 1933, for the governance of the petroleum industry, I am fully in accord. No question is before us at this time as to the power of Congress to regulate production. No question is here as to its competence to clothe the President with a delegated power whereby a code of fair competition may become invested with the force of law. The petitioners were never in jeopardy by force of such a code or of regulations made thereunder. They were not in jeopardy because there was neither statute nor regulation subjecting them to pains or penalties if they set the code at naught. One must deplore the administrative methods that brought about uncertainty for a time as to the terms of Executive orders intended to be law. Even so, the petitioners do not stand in need of an injunction to restrain the enforcement of a nonexistent mandate.

I am unable to assent to the conclusion that section 9 (c) of the National Recovery Act, a section delegating to the President a very different power from any that is involved in the regulation of production or in the promulgation of a code, is to be nullified upon the ground that his discretion is too broad or for any other reason. My point of difference with the majority of the Court is narrow. I concede that to uphold the delegation there is need to discover in the terms of the act a standard reasonably clear whereby discretion must be governed. I deny that such a standard is lacking in respect of the prohibitions permitted by this section when the act with all its reasonable implications is considered as a whole. What the standard is becomes the pivotal inquiry.

As to the nature of the act which the President is authorized to perform, there is no need for implication. That at least is definite beyond the possibility of challenge. He may prohibit the transportation in interstate and foreign commerce of petroleum and the products thereof produced or withdrawn from storage in excess of the amount permitted by any State law or valid regulation or order prescribed thereunder. He is not left to roam at will among all the possible subjects of interstate transportation, picking and choosing as he pleases. I am far from asserting now that delegation would be valid if accompanied by all that latitude of choice. In the laying of his interdict he is to confine himself to a particular commodity, and to that commodity when produced or withdrawn from storage in contravention of the policy and statutes of the States. He has choice, though within limits, as to the occasion, but none whatever as to the means. The means have been prescribed by Congress. There has been no grant to the Executive of any roving commission to inquire into evils and then, upon discovering them, do anything he pleases. His act being thus defined, what else must he ascertain in order to regulate his discretion and bring the power into play? The answer is not given if we look to section 9 (c) only, but it comes to us by implication from a view of other sections where the standards are defined. The prevailing opinion concedes that a standard will be as effective if imported into section 9 (c) by reasonable implication as if put there in so many words. If we look to the whole structure of the statute, the test is plainly this, that the President is to forbid the transportation of the oil when he believes, in the light of the conditions of the industry as disclosed from time to time, that the prohibition will tend to effectuate the declared policies of the act—not merely his own conception of its policies, undirected by any extrinsic guide, but the policies announced by section 1 in the forefront of the statute as an index to the meaning of everything that follows.[16]

Oil produced or transported in excess of a statutory quota is known in the industry as "hot oil", and the record is replete with evidence as to the effect of such production and transportation upon the economic situation and upon national recovery. A declared policy of Congress in the adoption of the act is "to eliminate unfair competitive practices." Beyond question an unfair competitive practice exists when "hot oil" is transported in interstate commerce with the result that law-abiding dealers must compete with lawbreakers. Here is one of the standards set up in the act to guide the President's discretion. Another declared policy of Congress is "to conserve natural resources." Beyond question the disregard to statutory quotas is wasting the oil fields in Texas and other States, and putting in jeopardy of exhaustion one of the treasures of the Nation. All this is developed in the record and in the arguments of counsel for the Government with a wealth of illustration. Here is a second standard. Another declared policy of Congress is to "promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries", and "except as may be temporarily required" to "avoid undue restriction of production." Beyond question prevailing conditions in the oil industry have brought about the need for temporary restriction in order to promote in the long run the fullest productive capacity of business in all its many branches, for the effect of present practices is to diminish that capacity by demoralizing prices and thus increasing unemployment. The ascertainment of these facts at any time or place was a task too intricate and special to be performed by Congress itself through a general enactment in advance of the event. All that Congress could safely do was to declare the act to be done and the policies to be promoted, leaving to the delegate of its power the ascertainment of the shifting facts that would determine the relation between the doing of the act and the attainment of the stated ends. That is what it did. It said to the President in substance: You are to consider whether the transportation of oil in excess of the statutory quotas is offensive to one or more of the policies enumerated in section 1, whether the effect of such conduct is to promote unfair competition or to waste the natural resources or to demoralize prices or to increase unemployment or to reduce the purchasing power of the workers of the Nation. If these standards or some of them have been flouted with the result of a substantial obstruction to industrial recovery, you may then by a prohibitory order eradicate the mischief.

I am not unmindful of the argument that the President has the privilege of choice between one standard and another, acting or failing to act according to an estimate of values that is individual and personal. To describe his conduct thus is to ignore the essence of his function. What he does is to inquire into the industrial facts as they exist from time to time. (Cf. Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394, at p. 409; Locke's Appeal, 72 Penn. St., 491, 498, quoted with approval in Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, at p. 694.) These being ascertained, he is not to prefer one standard to another in any subjective attitude of mind, in any personal or willful way. He is to study the facts objectively, the violation of a standard impelling him to action or inaction according to its observed effect upon industrial recovery—the ultimate end—as appears by the very heading of the title, to which all the other ends are tributary and mediate. Nor is there any essential conflict among the standards inter se, at all events when they are viewed in relation to section 9 (c) and the power there conferred. In its immediacy the exclusion of oil from the channels of transportation is a restriction of interstate commerce, not a removal of obstructions. This is self-evident, and, of course, was understood by Congress when the discretionary power of exclusion was given to its delegate. But what is restriction in its immediacy may in its ultimate and larger consequences be expansion and development. Congress was aware that for the recovery of national well-being there might be need of temporary restriction upon production in one industry or another. It said so in section 1. When it clothed the President with power to impose such a restriction—to prohibit the flow of oil illegally produced—it laid upon him a mandate to inquire and determine whether the conditions in that particular industry were such at any given time as to make restriction helpful to the declared objectives of the act and to the ultimate attainment of industrial recovery. If such a situation does not present an instance of lawful delegation in a typical and classic form (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649; United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506; Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394), categories long established will have to be formulated anew.

In what has been written I have stated, but without developing the argument, that by reasonable implication the power conferred upon the President by section 9 (c) is to be read as if coupled with the words that he shall exercise the power whenever satisfied that by doing so he will effectuate the policy of the statute as theretofore declared. Two canons of interpretation, each familiar to our law, leave no escape from that conclusion. One is that the meaning of a statute is to be looked for not in any single section but in all the parts together and in their relation to the end in view (Cherokee Intermarriage Cases,, 203 U. S. 76, 89; McKee v. United States, 164 U. S. 287; Talbott v. Silver Bow County, 139 U. S. 438, 443, 444). The other is that when a statute is reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, by one of which it is unconstitutional and by the other valid, the court prefers the meaning that preserves to the meaning that destroys (United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 407; Knights Templars' Indemnity Co. v. Jarman, 187 U. S. 197, 205). Plainly section 1, with its declaration of the will of Congress, is the chart that has been furnished to the President to enable him to shape his course among the reefs and shallows of this act. If there could be doubt as to this when section 1 is viewed alone, the doubt would be dispelled by the reiteration of the policy in the sections that come later. In section 2, which relates to administrative agencies, in section 3, which relates to codes of fair competition, in section 4, which relates to agreements and licenses, in section 6, which prescribes limitations upon the application of the statute, and in section 10, which permits the adoption of rules and regulations, authority is conferred upon the President to do one or more acts as the delegate of Congress when he is satisfied that thereby he will aid "in effectuating the policy of this title" or in carrying out its provisions. True, section 9, the one relating to petroleum, does not by express words of reference embody the same standard, yet nothing different can have been meant. What, indeed, is the alternative? Either the statute means that the President is to adhere to the declared policy of Congress or it means that he is to exercise

[16] "SECTION 1. * * * It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof; and to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision, to eliminate unfair competitive practices, to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required), to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve natural resources."

The act as a whole is entitled as one "To encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes"; and the heading of title I, which includes secs. 1 to 10, is "Industrial Recovery."

a merely arbitrary will. The one construction invigorates the act; the other saps its life. A choice between them is not hard.

I am persuaded that a reference, express or implied, to the policy of Congress as declared in section 1 is a sufficient definition of a standard to make the statute valid. Discretion is not unconfined and vagrant. It is canalized within banks that keep it from overflowing. Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649), United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S. 506), and Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394) state the applicable principle. Under these decisions the separation of powers between the Executive and Congress is not a doctrinaire concept to be made use of with pedantic rigor. There must be sensible approximation, there must be elasticity of adjustment, in response to the practical necessities of government, which cannot foresee today the developments of tomorrow in their nearly infinite variety. The Interstate Commerce Commission, probing the economic situation of the railroads of the country, consolidating them into systems, shaping in numberless ways their capacities and duties, and even making or unmaking the prosperity of great communities (Texas & Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 289 U. S. 627), is a conspicuous illustration. (See, e. g., 41 Stat. 479–482, c. 91, secs. 405, 406, 407, 408; 42 Stat. 27, c. 20; 49 U. S. C., secs. 3, 4, 5. Cf. Intermountain Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 476; N. Y. Central Securities Co. v. United States, 287 U. S. 12, 24, 25; Sharfman, The Interstate Commerce Commission, vol. 2, pp. 357, 365.) There could surely be no question as to the validity of an act whereby carriers would be prohibited from transporting oil produced in contravention of a statute if, in the judgment of the Commission, the practice was demoralizing the market and bringing disorder and insecurity into the national economy. What may be delegated to a commission may be delegated to the President. "Congress may feel itself unable conveniently to determine exactly when its exercise of the legislative power should become effective, because dependent on future conditions, and it may leave the determination of such time to the discretion of the Executive" (Hampton & Co. v. United States, supra, at p. 407). Only recently (1932) the whole subject was discussed with much enlightenment in the report by the Committee on Ministers' Powers to the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. (See especially pp. 23, 51.) In the complex life of today the business of government could not go on without the delegation, in greater or less degree, of the power to adapt the rule to the swiftly moving facts.

A striking illustration of this need is found in the very industry affected by this section, the production of petroleum and its transportation between the States. At the passage of the National Recovery Act no one could be certain how many of the States would adopt valid quota laws or how generally the laws would be observed when adopted, or to what extent illegal practices would affect honest competitors or the stability of prices or the conservation of natural resources or the return of industrial prosperity. Much would depend upon conditions as they shaped themselves thereafter. Violations of the State laws might turn out to be so infrequent that the honest competitor would suffer little, if any, damage. The demand for oil might be so reduced that there would be no serious risk of waste, depleting or imperiling the resources of the Nation. Apart from these possibilities, the business might become stabilized through voluntary cooperation or the adoption of a code or otherwise. Congress, not unnaturally, was unwilling to attach to the State laws a sanction so extreme as the cutting off of the privilege of interstate commerce unless the need for such action had unmistakably developed. What was left to the President was to ascertain the conditions prevailing in the industry and prohibit or fail to prohibit according to the effect of those conditions upon the phases of the national policy relevant thereto.

From a host of precedents available, both legislative and judicial, I cite a few as illustrations. By an act approved June 4, 1794, during the administration of Washington (1 Stat. 372; Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 683), Congress authorized the President, when Congress was not in session, and for a prescribed period "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper." By an act of 1799, February 9 (1 Stat. 613, 615), suspending commercial intercourse with France and its dependencies, "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States, by his order to remit, and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions aforesaid, * * * and also to revoke such order (i. e., reestablish the restraints), whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require." By an act of October 1, 1890 (26 Stat. 567, 612), sustained in Field v. Clark, supra, the President was authorized to suspend by proclamation the free introduction into this country of enumerated articles when satisfied that a country producing them imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which he may deem to be reciprocally unequal or unreasonable. By an act of September 21, 1922 (42 Stat. 858, 941, 945), sustained in Hampton & Co. v. United States, supra, the President was empowered to increase or decrease tariff duties so as to equalize the differences between the costs of production at home and abroad, and empowered, by the same means, to give redress for other acts of discrimination or unfairness "when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby." Delegation was not confined to an inquiry into the necessity or occasion for the change. It included the magnitude of the change, the delegate thus defining the act to the performed. By an act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat. 11, 35), amended in 1905 (33 Stat. 628), regulating the forest reservations of the Nation, the purpose of the reservations was declared to be "to improve and protect the forest within the reservation", and to secure "favorable conditions of water flows, and to furnish a continuous supply of lumber for the use and necessities of citizens of the United States." Without further guide or standard, the Secretary of Agriculture was empowered to "make such rules and regulations and establish such service as will insure the objects of such reservations, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction." The validity of these provisions was upheld in United States v. Grimaud, supra, as against the claim by one who violated the rules that there had been an unlawful delegation. Many other precedents are cited in the margin.[17] They teach one lesson and a clear one.

There is no fear that the Nation will drift from its ancient moorings as the result of the narrow delegation of power permitted by this section. What can be done under cover of that permission is closely and clearly circumscribed both as to subject matter and occasion. The statute was framed in the shadow of a national disaster. A host of unforeseen contingencies would have to be faced from day to day, and faced with a fullness of understanding unattainable by anyone except the man upon the scene. The President was chosen to meet the instant need.

A subsidiary question remains as to the form of the Executive order, which is copied in the margin.[18] The question is a subsidiary one, for unless the statute is invalid, another order with fuller findings or recitals may correct the informalities of this one, if informalities there are. But the order to my thinking is valid as it stands. The President was not required either by the Constitution or by any statute to state the reasons that had induced him to exercise the granted power. It is enough that the grant of power had been made and that pursuant to that grant he had signified the will to act. The will to act being declared, the law presumes that the declaration was preceded by due inquiry and that it was rooted in sufficient grounds. Such, for a hundred years and more, has been the doctrine of this Court. The act of February 28, 1795 (1 Stat. 424), authorized the President "whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe", to call forth such number of the militia of the States as he shall deem necessary and to issue his orders to the appropriate officers for that purpose. (Cf. Constitution, art. I, clause 15.) When war threatened in the summer of 1812 President Madison, acting under the authority of that statute, directed Major General Dearborn to requisition from New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut certain numbers of the States' militia (American State Papers, Military Affairs, vol. 1, pp. 322–325). No finding of "imminent danger of invasion" was made by the President in any express way, nor was such a finding made by the Secretary of War or any other official.

The form of the requisitions to Massachusetts and Connecticut appears in the state papers of the Government (American State Papers, supra); the form of those to New York was almost certainly the same. Replevin was brought by a New York militia man who refused to obey the orders, and whose property had been taken in payment of a fine imposed by a court martial. The defendant, a deputy marshal, defended on the ground that the orders were valid, and the plaintiff demurred because there was no allegation that the President had adjudged that there was imminent danger of an invasion. The case came to this Court (Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19). In an opinion by Story, J., the Court upheld the seizure. "The argument is [he wrote], that the power confided to the President is a limited power, and can be exercised only in the cases pointed out in the statute, and, therefore, it is necessary to aver the facts which bring the exercise within the purview of the statute. In short, the same principles are sought to be applied to the delegation and exercise of this power intrusted to the Executive of the Nation for great political purposes, as might be applied to the humblest officer in the Government, acting upon the most narrow and special authority. It is the opinion of the Court that this objection cannot be maintained. When the President exercises an authority confided to him by law, the presumption is that it is exercised in pursuance of law. Every public officer is presumed to act in obedience to his duty, until the contrary is shown; and, a fortiori, this presumption ought to be favorably applied to the Chief Magistrate of the Union. It is not necessary to aver that the act, which he may rightfully do, was so done." A like presumption has been applied in other cases and in a great variety of circumstances (The Philadelphia & Trenton R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448, 458; Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How. 327, 335; Carpenter v. Rannels, 19 Wall. 138, 146; The Confiscation Cases, 20 Wall. 92, 109; Knox County v. Ninth National Bank, 147 U. S. 91, 97; United States v. Chemical Foundation, 272 U. S. 1, 14, 15). This does not mean that the individual is helpless in the face of usurpation. A court will not revise the discretion of the Executive, sitting in judgment on his order as if it were the verdict of a jury (Martin v. Mott, supra.) On the other hand, we have said that his order may not stand if it is an act of mere oppression, an arbitrary flat that overleaps the bounds of judgment (Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U. S. 378, 399, 400, 401). The complainants and others in their position may show, if they can, that in no conceivable aspect was there anything in the conditions of the oil industry in July 1933 to establish a connection between the prohibitory order and the declared policies of the Congress. This is merely to say that the standard must be such as to have at least a possible relation to the act to be performed under the delegated power. One can hardly suppose that a prohibitory order would survive a test in court if the Executive were to assert a relation between the transportation of petroleum and the maintenance of the gold standard or the preservation of peace in Europe or the Orient. On the other hand, there can be no challenge of such a mandate unless the possibility of a rational nexus is lacking altogether. Here, in the case at hand, the relation between the order and the standard is manifest upon the face of the transaction from facts so notorious as to be within the range of our judicial notice. There is significance in the fact that it is not challenged even now.

The President, when acting in the exercise of a delegated power, is not a quasi-judicial officer, whose rulings are subject to review upon certiorari or appeal (The Chicago Junction case, 264 U. S. 258, 265; cf. Givens v. Zerbst, 255 U. S. 11, 20), or an administrative agency supervised in the same way. Officers and bodies such as those may be required by reviewing courts to express their decision in formal and explicit findings to the end that review may be intelligent (Florida v. United States, 282 U. S. 194, 215; Beaumont, Sour Lake & Western R. Co. v. United States, 282 U. S. 74, 86; United States v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., Jan. 7, 1935, — U. S. —; cf. Public Service Commission of Wisconsin v. Wisconsin Telephone Co., 289 U. S. 67). Such is not the position or duty of the President. He is the Chief Executive of the Nation, exercising a power committed to him by Congress and subject, in respect of the formal qualities of his acts, to the restrictions, if any, accompanying the grant, but not to any others. One will not find such restrictions either in the statute itself or in the Constitution back of it. The Constitution of the United States is not a code of civil practice.

The prevailing opinion cites Wichita Railroad & Light Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Kansas (260 U. S. 48) and Mahler v. Eby (264 U. S. 32, 44). One dealt with a delegation to a public utilities commission of the power to reduce existing rates if they were found to be unreasonable; the other a delegation to the Secretary of Labor of the power to deport aliens found after notice and a hearing to be undesirable residents. In each it was a specific requirement of the statute that the basic fact conditioning action by the administrative agency be stated in a finding and stated there expressly. If legislative power is delegated subject to a condition, it is a requirement of constitutional government that the condition be fulfilled. In default of such fulfillment, there is in truth no delegation, and hence no official action, but only the vain show of it. The analogy is remote between power so conditioned and that in controversy here.

Discretionary action does not become subject to review because the discretion is legislative rather than executive. If the reasons for the prohibition now in controversy had been stated in the order, the jurisdiction of the courts would have been no greater and no less. Investigation resulting in an order directed against a particular person after notice and a hearing is not to be confused with investigation preliminary and incidental to the formulation of a rule. An embargo under the act of 1794 would have been more than a nullity though there had been a failure to recite that what was done was essential to the public safety or to enumerate the reasons leading to that conclusion. If findings are necessary as a preamble to general regulations, the requirement must be looked for elsewhere than in the Constitution of the Nation.

There are other questions as to the validity of section 9 (c) in matters unrelated to the delegation of power to the President, and also questions as to the regulations adopted in behalf of the President by the Secretary of the Interior. They are not considered in the prevailing opinion. However, they have been well reviewed and disposed of in the opinion of Sibley, J., writing for the court below. It is unnecessary at this time to dwell upon them further.

The decree should be affirmed.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES IN AND FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, CENTRAL DIVISION

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND HAROLD L. ICKES, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, AS ADMINISTRATOR OF THE CODE OF FAIR COMPETITION FOR THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY, PLAINTIFFS, v. WILSHIRE OIL CO., INC., A CORPORATION, ET AL., DEFENDANTS—IN EQUITY NO. 126–M

Memorandum of decision

McCormick, district judge:

This suit in equity was commenced by the United States attorney for this judicial district on December 14, 1933. The action is authorized under section 3c of the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 195), and is on behalf of the Government and its administrator of the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry, as complainants, against the Wilshire Oil Co., Inc., a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, its officers and directors, and certain other corporate bodies engaged in the oil industry which are affiliates of the Wilshire Oil Co., as defendants.

The objective of complainants is to obtain a mandatory injunction restraining the defendants from producing crude oil or any product thereof from their respective wells in Santa Fe Springs and in the Huntington Beach oil fields of California in excess of the amounts allocated in and by the quotas and operating schedules as now compiled, and as they may be hereafter compiled and approved, pursuant to and in accordance with the terms of the code of fair competition for the Petroleum Industry, which has been established and promulgated under the authority of the National Industrial Recovery Act, supra.

The sole matters before the court at this time, and the only issues which are considered or determined now, are:

The right of complainants to an injunction pendente lite to compel the defendants to comply with quotas and operating schedules regulating the production of crude oil, gas, and petroleum products from their wells, in conformity with orders issued by governmental agencies under dates of July 26, 1934, and September 28, 1934, respectively, and any order amendatory or supplementary thereto that may be hereafter issued pursuant to the aforesaid petroleum code; and also to restrain defendants from withdrawing oil from storage, pending the final decision of this suit on the merits, without the approval of the planning and coordination committee which has been established by the oil industry under said petroleum code; and in the event that such temporary injunctive relief is denied;

The right of defendants to a prohibitory injunction pendente lite restraining the Government agents from attempting to apply or enforce the two aforesaid orders or any order made under authority of the petroleum code or the National Industrial Recovery Act, as against the production of crude oil, gas, or petroleum products from their wells respectively at either of the aforesaid California oil fields; and so restraining said governmental agencies from interfering with the defendants' withdrawal from storage of oil or petroleum products produced, or produced and refined, or to be refined, within the State of California.

There has been no restraining order issued against defendants on the original bill of complaint. From time to time the Government's application for temporary injunction has been continued, inasmuch as the defendants had been voluntarily complying with the allocations and quotas of the governmental agencies in the conduct of their oil producing and refining until August 1934.

It is admitted that the corporate defendants since that time have been exceeding production allocated to their oil wells by the orders made by the governmental authority, and the complainants on November 27, 1934, filed an amended and supplemental bill to restrain further excess production over governmental allocations, and to prohibit storage removals without governmental authority. Thereupon an order was directed to defendants requiring them to show cause why they should not be so restrained pendente lite. The application for temporary injunction in addition to the verified supplemental bill is supported by affidavits filed herein.

The defendants have joined issue upon the supplemental bill by filing a verified answer to it, and have also filed a verified counterclaim, also supported by affidavits, seeking the aforesaid affirmative relief of prohibitory injunction against the Government agents' orders, allocations, and quotas.

It is considered unnecessary to the determination of the issues before the court at this time to specifically analyze or to discuss in detail the allegations contained in the pleadings or the facts disclosed by the affidavits which have been filed in support of and in opposition to the respective motions for interlocutory injunction. Many of such matters must be and should be left to the hearing on the merits of this suit, where they can be adequately and fully presented by the respective suitors. This cannot be done, and is not expected to be done, upon applications for temporary injunctions.

In an action like the one before the court, where the Government is proceeding under an act of Congress that is designed to aid the constitutional national prerogative of regulating foreign or interstate commerce, or of restraining intrastate activities which interfere with and burden such national prerogative, all that need be shown to warrant the issuance of an injunction until the case can be heard and decided on its merits is that, upon consideration and weighing of all equities, greater damage to the general welfare and public interest involved is probable if the status quo of the controversy is maintained pending suit, than if the governmental regulations are observed during such period. I am satisfied from a study of the issues of this case as they are revealed in the record now before the court, and as they are illumined by judicial knowledge of the oil industry as reflected in equity receiverships which have come into this court, as well as from the history of the times, that the Government is entitled to require the defendants to comply with the two allocation orders of crude-oil production in suit, pending final decision of this case.

The orders which are assailed by defendants may be epitomized as regulations promulgated by the administrator of the petroleum code under the provisions of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act whereby certain persons active in the oil industry in California are designated by the administrator as the agency of the Government to compile and recommend to him crude-oil production quotas, pursuant to economic principles and statistical methods that are specified in the orders, and in accordance with the total crude-oil quotas for California, as the national administrator of the petroleum code shall certify it from time to time, to bring about and conserve an equitable and fair trade balance, to supply the oil consumers' demand of the country, and to prevent waste and disruption of established markets for petroleum and its products among the States of the Union. The plan that is designated in the orders recognizes three geographical, separate and distinct oil-producing districts within California, viz, the San Joaquin Valley, the coastal counties, and the Los Angeles Basin; and the total State quota which is certified by the national administrator of the petroleum code is subdivided among the three districts by the agency to balance production to the established total consumptive demand for petroleum and its products from the three districts respectively as it is determined from the statistical records of the United States Bureau of Mines. Then there is a further division of production into fields and again into pools within the respective districts, and finally an allotment and allowable production to each well within each pool.

From the showing made at the hearing of the motions for preliminary injunction, it appears that there has been during the months of July, August, September, and October 1934 no consumptive demand in California for crude oil produced in excess of the total allowables established and fixed by the administrator's orders. If such conclusion is correct, and accurately forecasts future market conditions, and I believe it presumptively does, then any production of crude oil in excess of the administrator's quotas either causes waste or goes into and affects the stream of interstate and foreign petroleum transactions. Either and both of these results demand regulation, in order that sound and fair competition may be fostered, and a most valuable natural resource may be conserved as far as it is consistent with the current requirements of safety, business, and industry to do so. Because of the national scope of the unique and integrated petroleum industry and its supreme importance in national security, Federal authority appears to be the only adequate regulating power. Therefore the vital substantial question for decision is whether or not such authority can be lawfully directed against defendants' oil-production operations in the two aforesaid districts.

The defendant companies are operating, in their producing, refining, transporting, and marketing, actual activities, entirely within the State of California. They claim, therefore, that inasmuch as the National Industrial Recovery Act and the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry relate solely to interstate and foreign commerce, the two allocation orders made solely under the authority thereof are ineffectual as to them, their oil wells, and their production processes.

Before crude-oil production in concrete cases can be accurately characterized as a purely local or as a national instrumentality of commerce it should be surveyed in the light of present-day economic and industrial conditions and requirements, and it is imperative that it be scrutinized under established geological factors that appear in no other known activity. Not much aid is furnished by precedents that relate to other enterprises or commodities or that are not commensurate with existing conditions in the producing features of the oil business. Says the Supreme Court in Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana (177 U. S. 203):

"Petroleum, gas, and oil are substances of peculiar character, and decisions in ordinary cases of mining for coal and other minerals which have a fixed situs cannot be applied to contracts concerning them without some qualifications." And in the recent case of Ryan v. Amazon Petroleum Corporation, 71 Fed. (2d) 1, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, in considering many decisions of the Supreme Court that relate to a determination of whether mining, manufacturing, generating electricity, etc., within a State are subject to Federal regulation under the commerce clause of the Constitution, said: "Oil production is either mining or manufacturing. Neither the one nor the other is ordinarily within the power of Congress to regulate within a State. * * * It may be that under peculiar circumstances, such, for example, as are here shown to exist in the relation of oil production in Texas to commerce in oil with and among the other States, such a burden on or interference with interstate commerce may exist as to justify congressional action, as in the case of intrastate rates which injuriously affect interstate commerce."

The wells of the respective defendant companies in the two oil fields of the Los Angeles district are admittedly penetrating the same oil-producing zones from which other oil enterprises are extracting crude oil, gas, and natural gasoline, which is by such other concerns put into and utilized in the stream of their respective interstate and foreign business. All of such other producers are complying with the allocation and quota orders which are resisted by the defendants.

It is evident that if the defendants are not required to comply with fair and nondiscriminating allocations of crude-oil production, the other producers in the same field or pool or zone will be forced to exceed their quotas in order to get their just share of the oil in the reservoir which is a common source of supply to all penetrating and operating therein. Such unregulated overproduction will necessarily upset the balance of the determined consumer demand for petroleum products, in California primarily, but also in other States and in foreign countries, where the trade is being supplied with crude oil and petroleum products which originate in and are produced from the common source of supply.

The defendants by their pleadings and in affidavits do raise an issue that discrimination has been practiced by the Government agencies in California against them and in favor of the other companies which are producing oil from the same fields and zones. There is a denial in the affidavits on the part of the complainants of this charge of favoritism, and in view of the conflict it cannot be determined at this time, but is reserved for further consideration at the hearing of this suit on the merits, when this important issue can be properly explored by the court, and definite findings and conclusions upon it can be made. Of course, if it is established that the methods or orders of the administrator of the petroleum code are arbitrary or discriminatory, they will not be sustained in a court of equity. Nevertheless, it is noteworthy, in connection with defendants' claim of unjust discrimination, that the affidavits on file, without denial, show that although the administrator has provided facilities for appeal and review of any of the allocation orders, the defendants have not availed themselves of recourse to such administrative processes to remedy the alleged inequities that they now complain of in this suit.

The following language of the Supreme Court in Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, supra, is strikingly applicable to the close drilling operations of defendants and others that exist in the two California oil fields and the extraction of crude oil therefrom.

"No time need be spent in restating the general common-law rule that the ownership in fee of the surface of the earth carries with it the right to the minerals beneath, and the consequent privilege of mining to extract them. And we need not, therefore, pause to consider the scope of the legislative authority to regulate the exercise of mining rights and to direct the methods of their enjoyment so as to prevent the infringement by one miner of the rights of others (Del Monte Mining Co. v. Last Chance Mining Co., 171 U. S. 55, 60). The question here arising does not require a consideration of the matters just referred to, but it is this: Does the peculiar character of the substances, oil and gas, which are here involved, the manner in which they are held in their natural reservoirs, the method by which and the time when they may be reduced to actual possession or become the property of a particular person, cause them to be exceptions to the general principles applicable to other mineral deposits, and hence subject them to different rules? True it is that oil and gas, like other minerals, are situated beneath the surface of the earth; but except for this one point of similarity, in many other respects they greatly differ. They have no fixed situs under a particular portion of the earth's surface within the area where they obtain. They have the power, as it were, of self-transmission. No one owner of the surface of the earth, within the area beneath which the gas and oil move, can exercise his right to extract from the common reservoir, in which the supply is held, without, to an extent, diminishing the source of supply as to which all other owners of the surface must exercise their rights. The waste by one owner, caused by a reckless enjoyment of his right of striking the reservoir, at once, therefore, operates upon the other surface owners. Besides, whilst oil and gas are different in character, they are yet one, because they are unitedly held in the place of deposit."

In any present-day evaluation of the effect on commerce of the established legal doctrine of capture that applies to crude-oil production, notice must be given to the geological fact that an oil structure is a reservoir of oil, gas, and gas in solution, and that it becomes a gas and hydraulic engine when the first well disturbs the equilibrium of the gaseous, hydraulic, and rock pressures which was necessary to retain the pool in that particular place. This interference recurs with each penetrating contact with the reservoir. Drilling wells into various parts of the field produces gas or oil, or both; or water, or oil and water; or dry holes; all depending upon their location. The maximum ultimate recovery of oil can therefore be brought about only by mandatory regulation of production elements so as to utilize these reservoir forces for the production of crude oil, rather than permitting the dissipation of gas or the channeling of water through oil sands to the wells.

If the ancient rule of capture is stretched to its broadest sense, it will recognize no right to governmental protection, even against the malicious waste of naval oil reserves or of natural resources of the Nation, regardless of the present-day nearness to one another of separately controlled producing wells. So important today are regulating safeguards to commerce that Mr. Justice Butler, writing for the Supreme Court, in the recent case of Champlin Refining Co. v. Commission (286 U. S. 228), said: "Where proportional taking from the wells in flush pools is not enforced, operators who do not have physical or market outlets are forced to produce to capacity in order to prevent drainage to others having adequate outlets."

The blending and intermingling of the interstate-commerce instrumentalities of the pool neighbors of the defendants with their media of intrastate business is so intimate and inextricable that the protection of the former by Federal power, which is indisputable, cannot be accomplished without the regulation of the latter by the same authority. (See Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U. S. 295; Houston & Texas Railway v. United States, 234 U. S. 342; Minnesota Rate cases, 230 U. S. 352.)

One has but to superficially note the indispensability of petroleum products in national security and transportation to appreciate the magnitude and singular situation in the United States of the oil industry. It is the industry as an entity that is sought to be regulated by the Federal Government, and not merely some part of it. This industry is sui generis. It is so necessarily interrelated with and among all of the States that, regardless of where any crude-oil production instrumentality of it may be physically located, the business is of itself national in scope and effect. Although less than a score of the States furnish all of the domestic production of crude oil, the market for this peculiar commodity and its products is not only Nation-wide but extends to our Territories and insular possessions as well, and even to foreign lands.

It seems to me that such a wide stream of commerce as the petroleum industry can be successfully protected only by regulating its flow at the source; and while it may be held that the producing well, when viewed apart from its correlative facilities, is intrastate, nevertheless, when the industry is considered, the well occupies no such local or restricted channel.

In Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 518) Chief Justice Taft, in quoting Justice Holmes, writing for the Supreme Court in Swift v. U. S. (196 U. S. 398), said: "Commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one drawn from the course of business."

If this salutary principle is applied to the oil business in our country, as it appears to me it has been by Congress, there is no question as to the right of the administrator of the petroleum code to regulate the production of crude oil from the defendants' wells, as it has been, at least to a prima facie degree, established that production by the defendant companies in the two California districts in excess of the administrator's quota will affect the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce.

No one reading the National Industrial Recovery Act can fail to observe the plain and obvious purpose of Congress in its enactment of this emergency and remedial statute. It is clearly stated that "a national emergency, productive of wide-spread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce * * * is hereby declared to exist", and that it is the congressional policy "to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof * * * to eliminate unfair competitive practices, * * * to avoid undue restrictions of production (except as may be temporarily required), * * * and to conserve natural resources."

There is little room to doubt the right of Congress to legislate to attain its expressed policy, and this court cannot substitute its judgment on the wisdom of the legislative policy. To the contrary, the statute being remedial and an emergency measure, and clear in its terms, it is the duty of the court to broadly apply it to effect its object.

"Let the end be legitimate", said Chief Justice Marshall in McCullogh v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316), "let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but which consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." (See also Wilson v. New, 243 U. S. 543.)

It is difficult to conceive of a more necessary and suitable means to regulate interstate and foreign traffic in petroleum products, in a general industrial depression, than to methodize crude-oil production. Such regulation satisfactorily appears at this time to be the function and purpose of the applicable sections of the petroleum code and the two orders under consideration. The defendant companies, having produced crude oil in excess of the quota, thereby affect interstate and foreign commerce, and are deemed to be using an unfair method of competition in commerce, in violation of subdivision (b) of section 3 of the National Industrial Recovery Act and article III of the petroleum code.

There is no doubt as to the constitutionality of the National Industrial Recovery Act as far as it relates to interstate and foreign commerce. It is clearly authorized by article I, section 8, clause 3, of our organic law. Congress is there given the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." These words impart powers, prerogatives, and responsibilities in the Federal Government that are not static. They are sufficiently elastic to meet changing economic, industrial, and social conditions in our national life without infringing upon guaranteed private property rights or invading unsurrendered exclusive State authority at such times.

I believe it is undeniable that the purpose of Congress in the Recovery Act was to assist economic and industrial rehabilitation in the United States by removing obstructions to interstate and foreign commerce. This is clearly a Federal power, and in exercising it anything that is reasonably and seasonably adapted to accomplish the congressional purpose and that is not clearly prohibited by our dual systems of government should be sustained by the courts.

And in dealing with the contemporaneous petroleum industry specifically, a practical conception of the locale, magnitude, and instrumentalities of the business, rather than the blind adherence to archaic precedents, should be the judicial yardstick for measuring the extent and validity of remedial legislation. Consequently, expressions in some early opinions that localize valid public regulations of crude-oil production cannot be used today to measure modern regulatory requirements of the petroleum industry in the United States. It is now a huge integrated entity, whose units are inseparably linked around all of the States, and whose protection is necessary for national security. It appears to me that only by an unwarranted stretch of construction can present-day regulation of crude oil in the petroleum industry be regarded as one of the reserved powers of the States under the tenth amendment to the Constitution.

Any objection to the Recovery Act or to the petroleum code upon the ground that there reposes in either an unlawful delegation of legislative power is without merit.

The general rule applicable to remedial statutes that create administrative agencies to effectuate the purposes of the law is that Congress is required to legislate on the subject so far as reasonably practicable, and to express its purpose by the declaration of an intelligible principle, and leave to the person or body authorized in the act to administer it the power to supply the details, methods, and regulations and standards which will operate to accomplish the purpose of the statute (Butterfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470; Marshall Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649; St. Louis & Iron Mountain v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281).

Attention has already been directed to the expressed purpose of Congress in the Recovery Act. I consider it unnecessary in this memorandum to quote any further from the law to show that it contains all of the requirements of the decisions of the Supreme Court that establish the general rule just mentioned. Suffice it to say that neither the act nor the code which was formulated by the industry itself, with the approval of the President under the act, contains any unlawful delegation of power, considering the practical aspects of the situation that confronted Congress in the petroleum industry of the United States.

In conclusion it should be stated that I have found no decision of the Supreme Court that directly prohibits the Federal Government from regulating crude-oil production within the several States, as prescribed by the National Industrial Recovery Act and the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry. The closest approach to an authoritative ruling by that Court upon the problem before this court is found in Champlin Refining Co. v. Corporation Commission, supra, where the Court recognized the right of the State of Oklahoma to regulate oil production. This decision, in my opinion, goes no further than to hold that the Oklahoma statute involved did not burden interstate commerce. I believe it does not apply to the facts of this suit as they have been found by this court. The facts here show that the production operations of the defendant companies do interfere with the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce; and we are here directly considering Federal authority under an act of Congress designed to aid interstate and foreign commerce.

The unfair and profitless competition of the producing and refining units of the oil industry in the Nation during the depression, until the passage of the Recovery Act and the approval of the petroleum code, demonstrates the imperative necessity of Nation-wide coordinated regulation of this mighty medium of commerce and security. It is my deliberate judgment that the remedial recovery statute will fail to accomplish its end of removing obstructions to the free flow of the stream of interstate and foreign commerce in the petroleum industry if the agencies that the act creates through the code are precluded from regulating the unique, fugitive, and basic mineral that is the genesis of all oil business.

The complainants are entitled to restrain further violations of the orders of the administrator pendente lite; and defendants' application for temporary injunction is denied.

Dated at Los Angeles, Calif., December 31, 1934.

NATION-WIDE REFERENDUM OF GOVERNORS SHOWS OVERWHELMING SENTIMENT FOR DIRECT PRIMARY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the direct primary and to include therein a brief summary of the canvass of Governors on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, during the last few days I have had positive and visual evidence that the doctrine of rule by the people, so passionately cherished and maintained by Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, is not a dead letter in this country, but is still a living, vital, motivating philosophy.

I have canvassed the Governors of all of the States to ascertain how they individually stand and how their States stand on the direct primary for nominating candidates for public offices, as compared with the old, archaic, reactionary, boss-ridden convention system, and I find, to my great delight, that the direct primary is universally the favored method. Looking over the replies which have come from Governors all over the Union, I find that they echo the immortal principle enunciated by Thomas Jefferson more than a hundred years ago when he said:

The will of the people is the only legitimate foundation of any government, and to protect its free expression should be its first object.

In taking this Nation-wide referendum, my purpose was to bring out in bold relief the true status of the primary in America. Only one solitary Governor of a State that has the primary expressed himself in opposition to that method of making nominations, and that one is the Governor of Michigan. With that exception, sentiment among the Governors is unanimous. Every Democratic Governor who expressed his views was for the primary and against the convention system.

The general opinion of the Governors, as expressed in letters received, is that repeal of the primary would be a reactionary, backward step. The Governors of the various States are thus on record as being overwhelmingly in favor of the primary system of making nominations for public offices and in opposition to the convention system.

INDIANA WILL NOT FAIL THE NATION

Mr. Speaker, there has been talk that in this year 1935 Indiana might lead a march of States back into the old reactionary camp where special privilege flourishes, and where, in the old days, pampered interests contributed to all of the campaign funds and manipulated the conventions of all parties so as to nominate their trusted favorites on every ticket. They could not lose! I do not place any dependence in these reports.

I do not believe that Indiana is going to put itself in the position of the Irishman with whom the entire regiment is out of step. I do not believe that Indiana is going to proclaim itself out of harmony with the great national chorus. I do not believe that Indiana, the State where I was born and where all of my affections lie, is going to say to designing and grasping special interests, "Come and take possession of our nominating machinery." Indiana is not going to substitute government by bosses and special interests for government by the people.

Indiana is not going to turn its back on Thomas R. Marshall, John W. Kern, and the other great spirits of the past who 20 years ago, after two Democratic State conventions had endorsed the direct primary, succeeded, with the cooperation of Woodrow Wilson, in securing the enactment of the Indiana primary law after Mr. Kern from his desk in the United States Senate had sent to every Democratic member of the Indiana Legislature the following message:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, 1915.

Impossible for me to leave here. Hope Democratic legislature will enact primary law. Indiana's splendid Democratic Governor recommends it; the greatest Democratic President since Jefferson urges it; Bryan, the best-loved American Democrat, advises it; two Democratic State conventions have pledged the honor of the party that it shall be passed. Is it possible that the will of a quarter of a million Democrats shall be thwarted by a few men? That is the supreme issue, vastly more important than any one piece of legislation.

JOHN W. KERN.

No, Mr. Speaker, the reports we have heard in Washington that Indiana is going to lead a march of States back into the reactionary camp is a mistake, first, because the States would not be led and, secondly, because the members of the Indiana Legislature, as I size them up, are men of a high order, typical of our best citizenship, real Hoosiers who revere the history and traditions of our beloved State, and who would not, I feel sure, place Indiana in the unenviable position of being the first State in the Union to repeal that great instrumentality of popular government—the direct primary.

GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK FOR DIRECT PRIMARY

Mr. Speaker, the sentiment of America is shown by the letters I have received from the Governors of the States in answer to my questionnaire as to their attitude on the direct primary.

According to Herbert H. Lehman, Governor of New York and friend of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the New York law is similar to the existing Indiana statute, nominations for Senator and State offices being made in State convention and other nominations from Congressman down being made in primaries. Governor Lehman is opposed to repeal of the primary and in a letter to me says:

There is some difference of opinion as to the effectiveness of the primary system in New York State. I might add, however, that by and large there have been, to my knowledge, very few complaints against it. I cannot recall any case of newspaper editorial comment advocating its repeal.

A. Harry Moore, Governor of New Jersey, the State where Woodrow Wilson fought and won the first great battle for the primary, advises that the primary system in that State "works satisfactorily and in the public interest."

GOVERNOR RITCHIE APPROVES DIRECT PRIMARY

Albert C. Ritchie, four times Governor of Maryland, writes as follows:

It is true, of course, that the primary system has not worked out in all cases in accordance with the expectations of its advocates. However, I am still one of these, and I believe this system is the best for the nomination of public officers with the possible exception of judge.

Benjamin B. Moeuer, Governor of Arizona, states that Arizona has the primary system of making nominations for public offices; that it works satisfactorily and in the public interest and that he would not favor its repeal.

GOVERNORS EAST AND WEST ENDORSE PRIMARY

Gifford Pinchot, Governor of Pennsylvania, writes:

I am glad to tell you that we have the primary system in Pennsylvania; that it works well—far better than the old convention system—and that I am unalterably opposed to its repeal.

C. Ben Ross, Governor of Idaho, says that Idaho has the primary system, that it is satisfactory, and operates in the interest of the public, and that he would oppose its repeal.

The same opinion is expressed by Edwin C. Johnson, Governor of Colorado, in respect to the operation of the primary law in that State. Speaking for Delaware, Gov. C. Douglass Buck says that Delaware is satisfied with its primary law, and he would oppose its repeal. B. M. Miller, Governor of Alabama, says he is opposed to repeal of the primary in Alabama, because it works satisfactorily and in the public interest. In upholding the primary law of Maine, Gov. Louis J. Brann says:

Apparently the present system is satisfactory to the public.

GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY FAVORS PRIMARY

Other expressions in letters from governors to me follow:
Ruby Laffoon, Governor of Kentucky:

In Kentucky the primary system is compulsory so far as all offices are concerned excepting the State officials. The nominating of State officials is left to the discretion of the governing committee, and they decide as to whether a primary or convention will be held. So far, this system has worked quite satisfactorily.

F. H. Cooney, Governor of Montana:

Montana uses the direct primary system and apparently most of the people feel that it works satisfactorily. I do not believe it will be repealed in Montana.

PRIMARY MAY BE STRENGTHENED IN WASHINGTON

Clarence D. Martin, Governor of Washington:

We have the primary system in this State, and it seems to have worked fairly satisfactory. I am quite sure the system will not be repealed in this State, unless it would be followed by a blanket primary ballot. This latter measure is to be considered by the legislature this winter, having been initiated in our State by a very large percentage of our citizens.

H. G. Kump, Governor of West Virginia:

We have a primary system of making nominations of candidates for public offices in West Virginia. It is reasonably satisfactory, but I believe a system whereby nominations must be made by a majority vote of those participating in a primary election would result in more satisfactory candidates. I would not advocate the repeal of our present plan unless it was supplanted by a plan providing for party nominations to be made by a majority vote.

Ole H. Olson, Acting Governor of North Dakota:

We have the primary system of making nominations for public office in this State. I will say that I do not advocate its repeal.

Repealing it would not improve matters any and will probably make conditions worse, although it would eliminate some expense to the State. Undoubtedly it has a clarifying influence in determining the intent of the voters.

SATISFACTORY IN VIRGINIA

George C. Peery, Governor of Virginia:

The primary generally prevails throughout the State. The primary has worked in a fairly satisfactory manner in this State.

John C. B. Ehringhaus, Governor of North Carolina:

We have the primary system for making nominations in North Carolina. While there are some imperfections and some complaint, on the whole we believe that the people are satisfied with the primary. Certainly the primary principle meets with rather universal approval. I have no intention of advocating its repeal.

Eugene Talmadge, Governor of Georgia:

We have the primary system of making nominations for public offices in Georgia, and, in my opinion, it works satisfactorily and in the public interest. I would not advocate its repeal.

NO REPEAL SENTIMENT IN OREGON

Julius L. Meier, Governor of Oregon:

The State of Oregon has the direct primary system of making nominations for public office. Insofar as I know, there is no active public sentiment in the State for the repeal of the law at this time.

John G. Winant, Governor of New Hampshire:

We have in New Hampshire the primary system of making nominations for public office, and, in my judgment, its workings are for the public interest and in the main satisfactory. I certainly should not advocate its repeal.

J. H. Davis, Jr., secretary to the Governor of Texas:

We have a primary system of making nominations for public office in this State; in fact, we have a double primary system, so that it is necessary to receive a majority of all votes cast in the first primary or to have what we term a run-off primary. This system has been in operation in Texas for a number of years, and while there may be some objections to it there does not appear to be any indication at present that the system will be abolished.

REPEALED TWICE AND REENACTED

J. H. White, secretary to the Acting Governor of Nevada:

Nevada has a primary system for making nominations for public office and apparently it meets with approval, for although it has twice been repealed during the past 20 years, yet the following legislation has reenacted such act, and it is now in force. I am directed to say that the Governor does not contemplate asking for its repeal.

Willard Mayberry, secretary to the Governor of Kansas:

Kansas has a primary system of making nominations, and although this plan received some criticism of late, most authorities still believe that it is regarded favorably by the public.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take a few minutes at this time to make several observations on the President's Budget message and to use the only right that a minority Member of the House has, which is to analyze, scrutinize, and possibly criticize messages coming from the President or any legislation that is presented on the floor of this House. My purpose of doing so is merely to keep the record straight. I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that before the present administration came into power the Republican President was very bitterly criticized by the man who is now in the White House for a small governmental deficit existing the year after the depression began. The present occupant of the White House claimed at that time that such a deficit would be ruinous to the country, its commerce, and its credit. Since the Democratic President has taken office, a deficit of over $10,000,000,000 has been piled up; and yet no one on this side has pointed out the difference between a Democratic deficit and a deficit under a Republican administration, for which we were denounced and severely criticized by Franklin Roosevelt and all the leading members of the Democratic Party.

I am going to quote just a few words of what the President had to say in his Pittsburgh speech on October 19, 1932, when he was a candidate for election:

Our Federal extravagance and improvidence bear a double evil: First, our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation; second, our credit structure is impaired by the unorthodox Federal financing made necessary by the unprecedented magnitude of these deficits.

Now, I am going to disclose to you a definite personal conclusion which I adopted the day after I was nominated in Chicago. Here it is: Before any man enters my Cabinet he must give me a two-fold pledge of—

(1) Absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform and especially to its economy plank.

(2) Complete cooperation with me, looking to economy and reorganization in his department.

I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues of this campaign. In my opinion it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business.

Those are the words of the President of the United States when he was a candidate for office, but most of which he has either ignored, violated, or repudiated.

On January 3, 1934, the President sent in a message to the Congress in which he stated that the Budget would be balanced in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and yet just a few days ago he sent another message to the Congress which further unbalances the Budget by another four and one-half billion dollars for that very year. It is only fair for the opposition to point out the mistake of the President that he miscalculated by four and a half billion dollars, and that the national debt in 1936 will be, according to the President, $35,000,000,000. Last year the President gave definite assurances that the maximum of the national debt would be $31,800,000,000. However, within 1 year that definite promise in reference to an all-time high is forgotten, and yesterday we were presented with a Budget message from the President stating that the national debt would be $35,000,000,000 next year. This does not take into consideration contingent obligations such as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation loans and mortgages on farms, and so forth, amounting to four or five billion dollars; and if we get back 50 cents on the dollar, we shall be lucky.

We must not forget the fact that this administration has failed to collect anything on the war debts in spite of the criticism leveled at the Hoover administration which was collecting two hundred million a year.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman against spending this money, such as for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which he just mentioned?

Mr. FISH. No; I am for it; but I think it should be included in the national debt.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman against spending this relief money?

Mr. FISH. I am going to speak in reference to that matter at some length, but not now.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope before the gentleman gets through, being spokesman for the minority, who is criticizing the administration for spending this money, that he will give us some constructive ideas as to how to get the people out of the depression.

Mr. FISH. All that is necessary to be done is to restore business confidence and not destroy it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Just tell us what the gentleman would do.

Mr. FISH. I will tell you what I would do. I would take the small-business man out of a governmental strait-jacket.

Mr. O'CONNOR. How?

Mr. FISH. I would stop hampering and harassing him with all kinds of Executive orders and "brain-trust" restrictions, so that he does not know where he is at, and when he goes to bed he has a headache and when he gets up in the morning he still has a hang-over. Restore business confidence. Give business a breathing spell and a little encouragement. That is the main issue before the country and that will automatically provide jobs for the unemployed in private industry. [Applause.] However, I do not want to talk on that particular issue today. It is true, however, that there is only one real issue before the country, and that is the employment of American wage earners by private industry at reasonable wages.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FISH. Permit me to finish my sentence.

The President's first message had to do with unemployment, but he did not say anything about employing some 12,000,000 men, 2,000,000 more unemployed than there were a year ago, and putting them back to work in private industry. The real test of these new-deal measures, and I supported many of them to start with as emergency propositions, is, Have they put American labor back to work? It is just like in war. The only thing that counts in war from the time a man puts on a uniform and takes up a rifle is success in battle. The only thing that counts with these new-deal measures is their success or failure in putting American wage earners back to work. That is the real test and on that basis they have proved unsound, unworkable, and tragic failures.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It has always been my impression that some of the largest industries in this country were the chief beneficiaries of the Republican Party and also the chief contributors to the Republican campaign funds; and for 5 years we have been waiting for these big industries to do their part and put people back in private employment. [Applause.] Does the gentleman counsel now and want the country to understand that we are going to wait and let our people starve until the Steel Trust and the other beneficiaries of the Republican Party see fit to put them to work? [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman that there is only one way to put men to work and that is to wipe out all the unsound, unworkable, and socialistic new-deal legislation and restore business confidence throughout the land. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; I cannot yield now.

I did not want to digress in the limited time to speak on the subject of unemployment, because I desire to discuss the Budget. I was rather led astray by the gentleman's colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and cannot yield further.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. GREEN. Will not the gentleman name the ones he would repeal?

Mr. FISH. In the near future and in detail.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. FISH. No; I am sorry I cannot yield.

I have only 5 minutes, and I wish the gentleman from New York, in his own time, later on, would answer the criticism I am going to make of the Budget message. I think the gentleman will recall that shortly before the election that great mathematician of the Democratic Party, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Postmaster General James A. Farley, announced he had discovered a surplus of $12,000,000 in the Post Office Department.

I hold in my hand figures submitted by the Budget, with the approval of the President, which show a deficit of $64,000,000 this year and an anticipated deficit of $82,000,000 for the next year.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield in the 5 minutes I have.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman has made a statement that I think should be challenged.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will have plenty of time to answer or make any statement he wants, but now it would be taken out of my time.

All that this great mathematician did was, by the use of black magic, or plain ordinary ink, to take out the franking-privilege expenditures, Government mail subsidies to the merchant marine, the subsidies for air mail and the maintenance of post-office buildings, and he finds himself with a surplus of $12,000,000; but here are the hard, cold facts, which show a deficit of $64,000,000 this year, and of $82,000,000 for the next year in the Post Office Department. The Democratic national chairman is a clever politician, but he is not clever enough to fool the Budget or hoodwink the American public. This is simply one item that has already been discussed somewhat in the press but shows to what extent the Democratic national chairman will go to give a false impression to the people for political purposes. It is up to him to square himself with the Director of the Budget. This particular Budget message also refers to payments of the interest on the debt for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, totaling $835,000,000, but only $875,000,000 for the year ending in 1936. I do not know who computed these debt charges, but I do know that this Budget shows a deficit of four and a half billion dollars, and I do not believe that the interest rate would be less than 3 percent, which would mean $120,000,000, and in estimating the debt charges for the same year someone simply added on $40,000,00 and let it go at that. As a matter of fact the debt interest estimate is clearly inadequate and should be in excess of a billion dollars on a thirty-five billion debt. The interest charges alone are well above the total appropriations for the Federal Government 20 years ago. However, it is perfectly clear that in addition to the deficit of four and a half billion dollars you will be lucky if it is not twice that amount before you get through, when you add on the bonus and some other pending legislation.

My own estimate of the deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, is forty billions, which will require an annual debt interest of approximately a billion and a half. Where is the money coming from? We are in the midst of an orgy of uncontrolled squandering and spending, with no thought of balancing the Budget or the day of reckoning. Why not try to help and encourage private industry instead of copying Soviet Russia, rushing headlong into debt and turning all business over to the Government. Let us take our Government out of all business that competes with private industry. This policy of the administration is leading the country into inflation, chaos, and governmental bankruptcy.

Now, the gentleman from New York wanted to know whether I approved the spending of money for relief. I voted for every single appropriation for the C. W. A. I believe in giving adequate relief to the needy and unemployed. I am somewhat doubtful if it is the proper way to do it—to turn $4,000,000,000 over to the President in a lump sum. I do not believe in taking any more power away from the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] I think the time has come to take back legislative power from the President and place it in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] It is time to put an end to government by Executive orders.

As far as spending this $4,000,000,000 is concerned, the P. W. A. spent $2,000,000,000 and placed less than 1,000,000 men at work in steady jobs. I believe this $4,000,000,000 will not begin to be enough to take care of three and a half million employable men now on Government relief work. I believe it will cost nearly $8,000,000,000 to employ 3,500,000 men on public works, and I base this on what has already been done, the experience under the P. W. A. and the experience in Great Britain. Great Britain started out by spending $500,000,000 on public works. They found it failed. They found it cost half a billion dollars to put 200,000 men to work, and their rates of wages are less than ours. So I think it is very questionable, and I would prefer a direct dole or unemployment insurance, or, better still, to lend money to private industry to start the factory wheels turning. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed in order for 10 minutes to reply to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], whom personally we all like, prefaced his political attack with the request that he "be permitted to speak out of order." He invariably speaks "out of order" whenever he attempts to unjustly malign our Democratic administration. Unlike him, my request was that I "be permitted to speak in order", because it is always in order to answer speeches that are strictly partisan.

When our great Democratic leader now in the White House made his speech in Pittsburgh in October 1932 denouncing the inexcusable and unconscionable Republican deficits, he then had in mind the unjustifiable deficits which wasteful and extravagant Republican administrations were continuing to pile up through the improper spending of the public money out of the people's Treasury to enrich a little coterie of distinguished Republicans who contribute the Republican campaign expenses and keep the Republican National Committee out of debt. We have never had any deficits of that kind in any Democratic administration.

I imagine that while making that speech in Pittsburgh Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt then must have had in mind the $157,109.91 you Republicans wasted and misspent on your Graham of Illinois smelling committee, and the $50,000 you Republicans wasted and misspent on your Joe Walsh snooping committee, which went out to the California coast in a special train of Pullmans and diners, and lived in them there for weeks. And not one single breath of scandal could any of you Republicans establish against any Democratic official.

I imagine that Franklin D. Roosevelt then must have had in mind the $600,000 in cold cash that you Republicans wasted and misspent on your coal investigation, which accomplished absolutely nothing, and no American yet has been so foolish as to read more than a few pages of that voluminous report. He must have had in mind the $500,000 of our tax money that you Republicans allowed Mr. Hoover to waste and misspend on his ridiculous Wickersham Commission.

Our great President who now adorns the White House, when he made that memorable speech in Pittsburgh, must have had clearly in his mind the facts about that tremendous sum of $90,000,000 which your former Republican Vice President of the United States, Charles G. Dawes, succeeded in grabbing out of our Public Treasury as a loan for his defunct bank in Chicago.

When he was speaking of Republican deficits in Pittsburgh, President Roosevelt must have had pictured in his mind all of those splendid, substantial, costly buildings which Republican President Hoover junked, tore down, and demolished, at great public expense, to furnish several blocks of space for his new Department of Commerce mansion, and the $17,000,000 in cash out of the Treasury that Mr. Hoover wasted and misspent in erecting it, where even after this long period of time the army of Government employees working in it still have to use an expert guide to direct them how to find their offices, and which structure for the next 100 years will stand as the monumental Gibraltar of Republican waste and extravagance.

When standing before that audience in Pittsburgh our present great Democratic leader in the White House undoubtedly remembered that during the Republican campaign of 1928 contributions aggregating the enormous sum of $477,000 were paid to the Hoover-Curtis campaign fund by 24 angels of the Hoover-Mellon-Mills triumvirate who had been paid in tax refunds out of the people's Treasury the great sum of $114,000,000.

President Roosevelt then undoubtedly knew all about the refunds and credits given prominent Republicans by the Andrew W. Mellon regime, as shown in House Document No. 223, Seventy-second Congress, first session, and in House Document No. 535, Seventy-second Congress, second session, and in House Document No. 279, Seventy-third Congress, second session, being the reports of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, showing the refunds, credits, and interest handed back to Republican financiers on their income taxes for the years 1930, 1931, and 1932, respectively.

President Roosevelt then probably remembered the sources, whys, and wherefores of the enormous sums that were then pouring into the campaign chest of the Republicans and being used in the 1932 campaign against him. He knew that Andy Mellon, then Ambassador to the Court of St. James, stopped long enough from bowing his knee to royalty to contribute $25,000, and incidentally Andy received from the United States Treasury a cash refund of $72,359.55; and R. B. Mellon contributed $15,000 to the campaign, and the Republicans also got $5,000 from W. L. Mellon, while in cash refunds, credits, and abatements the Mellon Alminum Co. received from the United States a total of $1,555,925.27, and the Mellon Plate Glass Co. of Pittsburgh received $693,134, notwithstanding that since the declaration of war in April 1917 the property holdings and assets of Andrew W. Mellon and the various members of the Mellon family have increased about $500,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The total sum given back in tax refunds by the Republican administration in a few years to the benefit of the Republican Party would about equal the $4,000,000,000 which we propose to spend in the coming year.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I have a vivid recollection of the fact that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] in July 1932 itemized the large sums that were refunded, and gave us a very clear picture of how the Republicans were financing their campaign. He then told us about Mr. H. H. Timken contributing $7,000 to the Hoover campaign and having his Timken Roller Bearing Co., of Canton, Ohio, receive from the United States Treasury $672,293.49 in tax refunds, awards, and credits. And the present able chairman of our Rules Committee then advised us about the Guggenheim family of New York, Murry, S. R., Simon, and Mrs. H. F. Guggenheim, contributing $16,000 to the Republican campaign fund, and having the United States Treasury allow and pay back to them in tax refunds and interest the sum of $109,729.58 to S. R. Guggenheim, $46,626.08 to Simon Guggenheim, and $464,900.99 to the Chile Copper Co., in which the Guggenheims are financially interested.

Undoubtedly our President then knew, as he spoke in Pittsburgh, that Thomas E. Wilson, of Swift & Co., contributed $3,000, while Swift & Co. received from the United States Treasury $6,924,601.69 in tax refunds, credits, and abatements; and that Mrs. Edith Oliver Rea, of Pittsburgh, contributed $5,000 to the Hoover campaign and received from the Treasury Department $137,697.23 in tax refunds, credits, and interest; that Eldridge A. Johnson, of Camden, N. J., contributed $25,000 to the Republican committee and received from the United States $113,785.83 in tax refunds and credits; and that Percy A. Rockefeller, of New York, contributed $5,000 to the Republicans, and his Standard Oil Cos. of Kentucky and New York received awards and refunds from the Treasury of more than $2,000,000, and his other Rockefeller business concerns, all told, have received from the United States in tax refunds, credits, and abatements a total of more than $8,500,000.

In January 1932 the Treasury Department gave tax refunds of $608,274 to the Sinclair Oil Cos., and President Roosevelt undoubtedly remembered Harry Sinclair as the one who turned over $100,000 of the bonds of his company to Will Hays when he was chairman of the Republican National Committee to help pay off campaign debts. President Roosevelt clearly remembered the pertinent figures furnished us by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] showing that during the 10 years 1923 to 1932, during which the Republican administrations became so generous in handing the people's tax money back to Republican income-tax payers, they gave away more than $3,600,000,000 in tax refunds, credits, and abatements.

Whenever the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], or any other political sharpshooters from the Republican side of the aisle, make another attempt to snipe our Democratic administration, I want every Democrat in this House to look on pages 15517 and 15518 of the RECORD for July 15, 1932, and there read the list of big corporations, furnished us by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], all receiving from $500,000 to $15,000,000 each in tax refunds, credits, and abatements, and these facts will have a more quieting effect upon such obstreperous Republicans than tear bombs.

I want to remind my colleagues of the amendment which in January 1933 we passed on the deficiency bill (H. R. 13975) requiring all refunds on income taxes that amounted to more than $500 to be reported to Congress, and embracing the following safeguarding provision to stop these huge refunds, to wit:

Provided, That no refund or credit of any income or profits, estate, or gift tax in excess of $20,000 shall be made after the enactment of this act until a report thereof giving the name of the individual, trust estate, partnership, company, or corporation to whom the refund or credit is to be made, the amount of such refund or credit, and the facts in connection therewith are submitted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

And so forth, which would allow Congress to know something about these generous gifts before they were made. That deficiency appropriation bill went to the White House, and President Hoover vetoed it because of the above amendment. You will find President Hoover's veto message on page 2445 of the RECORD for January 24, 1933, in which he says:

I disapprove of the bill with great regret, as the appropriations provided for relief and other purposes are urgently needed, with the hope that Congress may early amend the act.

He wanted to force us to strike the above amendment from the bill. Why? He wanted to protect these big receivers of tax refunds. He had no other objection to any other provisions of the bill.

We Democrats tried to pass the bill with said amendment over his veto, and we got 193 votes, but the Republicans got 158 votes, and we Democrats failed, because it required a two-thirds majority to pass over the President's veto. You will find the vote on page 2449 of the RECORD for January 24, 1933. With our Democratic war horses, like JOE BYRNS, BILL BANKHEAD, BOB DOUGHTON, JOHN O'CONNOR, ED TAYLOR, and TOM CULLEN, you will find our solid Democratic forces voting to pass that bill and the amendment over President Hoover's veto, while on the other hand you will find the Republicans following their leaders—the gentlemen from New York [Mr. SNELL and Mr. FISH], the gentlemen from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH and Mr. BACHARACH], and the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN, Mr. GIFFORD, and Mr. TINKHAM]—all voting to sustain President Hoover, and they killed said amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wanted to ask the gentleman from New York a question, and I will ask the gentleman from Texas. What was the deficit in the last half of the Hoover administration? Is it not a fact that it amounted to $4,000,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. It amounted to a billion dollars a year for each of his 4 years, or $4,000,000,000. Our friend from New York [Mr. FISH] is a good historian and knows the facts. He had in mind those facts when he asked to speak out of order.

There are many things worrying our Republican friends across the aisle. They remember that one of the first things our great President now in the White House did shortly after he was sworn in was to make that memorable proclamation that stopped President Hoover, Andy Mellon, and all other big Republican financiers from shipping their gold out of the United States. He impounded their gold. Then he found a lot of Republican banks other than Charles Dawes' in Chicago that were in unsound condition, and to protect the people he proclaimed all banks closed until he could check them up and find which were worthy to accept deposits from the American people.

Such acts as I have mentioned have endeared our President in the hearts of all the people, and it is this great popularity that is worrying Republicans. They have begun to load their popguns. Like Washington officials trying to scare starlings, they have begun to shake their tin cans with pebbles in them.

While he was speaking, I was wondering whether our distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. FISH] would not recall the public money he wasted on his so-called "red" investigation. Why, we knew all of those facts before he ascertained them. That money is wasted unless he passes some measure to drive Communists out of the United States.

The money our President has spent and is spending is to keep women and little children from starving to death and to keep women and little children from freezing to death. Democratic deficits have resulted in no other way.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. What percent of this money goes to the people who are in dire need or distress and what percent goes to the white-collar bureaucratic politician?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am just as much against the waste of it as the gentleman is, but if you can spend any public money without wasting a great part of it, I would like to know how you would do it. That is a system that you Republicans built up for many years. Every time you would bring in a bill creating a commission or a new office of any kind you put the salaries up to 8, 10, 12, and 15 thousand dollars. I protested against it many times. That is the system you built up, you Republicans. You had men under your administration drawing as high as $40,000 and $50,000 Government salaries.

I have always been against it, and I am going to be the first Democrat and the first Member of this House to make an uncompromising fight in this Congress against waste and extravagance. [Applause.] But the money that our President is spending now is being spent to stop human suffering. Is there a single man on the Republican side of the aisle who will get up to say that he is not in favor of keeping women and children from starving and freezing to death? Will any of you get up to say that you are not in favor of providing jobs for the unemployed? What suggestion do you make, my good friend from New York? What suggestion do any of you fellows here make who criticize, when you were absolutely impotent? What do you suggest should be done? We now have a man in the White House with ideas. We have a man who has a constructive program and the thing that is bothering your minority leader more than anything else is that the man in the White House has the people of the United States behind him to a man. [Applause.]

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. MCLEOD appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS, JANUARY 8, 1935

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, speaking in behalf of the greater part of metropolitan New Orleans and the parishes bordering the Mississippi River from the city to the Gulf, where the Battle of New Orleans was directly fought and won by Americans, I speak in the sense that modern New Orleans is deeply enshrouded in appreciation for what Andrew Jackson accomplished for the United States of America; and so I wish to commemorate solemnly what many of us believe to be one of the outstanding events in American history.

For to Andrew Jackson is due the vital fact that the western boundary of the United States is the Pacific and not the Mississippi.

This is quite sufficient to immortalize him, to win him a place among the highest of the benefactors and patriots of America. For this service we can forgive him much. For what would the country now be with Canada in possession of the great West, with the red flag of England facing the stars and stripes on opposite banks of the Father of Waters? Buell has preserved this conversation which he heard from Gov. William Allen, of Ohio, who was a party to it:

Near the end of General Jackson's second administration and shortly after the admission of Arkansas to the Union, I, being the Senator-elect from Ohio, went to Washington to take the seat on March 4.

General Jackson—he always preferred to be called general rather than Mr. President, and so we always addressed him by his military title—General Jackson invited me to lunch with him. No sooner were we seated than he said, "Mr. Allen, let us take a little drink to the new star in the flag—Arkansas!" This ceremony being duly observed, the general said, "Allen, if there had been disaster instead of victory at New Orleans, there never would have been a State of Arkansas."

This, of course, interested me, and I asked, "Why do you say that, General?"

Then he said, "If Packenham had taken New Orleans the British would have claimed that the Treaty of Ghent, which had been signed 15 days before the battle, provided for restoration of all territory, places, and possessions taken by either nation from the other during the war, with certain unimportant exceptions."

"Yes; of course", he replied. "But the minutes of the conference at Ghent, as kept by Mr. Gallatin, represent the British commissioners as declaring in exact words 'We do not admit Bonaparte's construction of the law of nations. We cannot accept it in relation to any subject matter before us.'

"At that moment", pursued General Jackson, "none of our commissioners knew what the real meaning of these words was. When they were uttered, the British commissioners knew that Packenham's expedition had been decided on. Our commissioners did not know it. Now, since I have been Chief Magistrate I have learned from diplomatic sources of the most unquestionable authority that the British ministry did not intend the Treaty of Ghent to apply to the Louisiana Purchase at all. The whole corporation of them from 1803 to 1815, Pitt, the Duke of Portland, Greenville, Perceval, Lord Liverpool, and Castlereagh—denied the legal right of Napoleon to sell Louisiana to us, and they held, therefore, that we had no right to that territory. So you see, Allen, that the words of Mr. Goulburn on behalf of the British commissioners, which I have quoted to you from Albert Gallatin's minutes of the conference, had a far deeper significance than our commissioners could penetrate. These words were meant to lay the foundation for a claim on the Louisiana Purchase entirely external to the provisions of the Treaty of Ghent. And in that way the British Government was signing a treaty with one hand while with the other hand behind its back it is dispatching Packenham's army to seize the fairest of our possessions.

"You can also see, my dear William", said the old general, waxing warm (having once or twice more during the luncheon toasted the new star), "you can also see what an awful mess such a situation would have been if the British program had been carried out in full. But Providence willed it otherwise. All the tangled web that the cunning of English diplomats could weave around our unsuspecting commissioners at Ghent was torn to pieces and soaked with British blood in half an hour at New Orleans by the never-missing rifles of my Tennessee and Kentucky pioneers. And that ended it. British diplomacy could do wonders, but it couldn't provide against such a contingency as that. The British commissioners could throw sand in the eyes of ours at Ghent, but they couldn't help the cold lead that my riflemen sprinkled in the face of their soldiers at New Orleans. Now, Allen, you have the whole story. Now you know why Arkansas was saved at New Orleans. Let's take another little one!"

It is indubitably true that if the British had succeeded in defeating Jackson and seizing Louisiana they would have held it, treaty to the contrary notwithstanding. As Jackson said, the commissioners did not know the significance of Mr. Goulburn's words, "We do not admit Napoleon's construction of the law of nations. We cannot accept it in relation to any subject matter before us." They all suspected an ulterior design, although they could not fathom it. Had Packenham been successful, had Jackson failed, it is as clear as anything can be that we should have had to accept the Mississippi as the western boundary of the United States or else fight the British again for it. It is singular that it has been reserved for Mr. Buell, over 60 years after the battle—he first published the Allen interview in 1875 and it did not attract the attention then that it did when it appeared in his biography of Jackson, published last year—to bring out this point so clearly that it has now become one of the accepted facts of our history. The whole chapter concerning it may be studied with great profit in Mr. Buell's book.

It is with peculiar happiness that I reaffirm that the preservation to his country of that great and magnificent territory beyond the Mississippi is due to the skill and determination and conspicuous ability of that great backwoodsman. A share of the honor for these results must be accorded William Henry Harrison. For had Proctor and Tecumseh been successful, I believe it would have been absolutely impossible to have driven the British from the northwest territory they had seized, and the cross of St. George would have waved forever from the Rocky Mountains to the Golden Gate.

Jackson passionately disliked the English, and his inveterate animosity cost them dear.

He had hereditary wrongs to avenge on the British, and he hated them with an implacable fury that was absolutely devoid of fear.

Parton, the Englishman, says:

He cherished that intense antipathy to Great Britain which distinguished the survivors of the Revolution, some traces of which would be discerned in the less enlightened parts of the country until within these few years. (It may still be discerned even among the enlightened.—C. T. B.) In these respects he was the most American of Americans—an embodied Declaration of Independence—the Fourth of July incarnate! To him was vouchsafed the supreme satisfaction of thwarting one of the most gigantic projects ever conceived by a British Cabinet, struggled for by British diplomacy, fought for by the British army, and I am confident that never has there been a man on earth who took greater pleasure and satisfaction out of a success than Andrew Jackson did at New Orleans. It was some compensation for the loss of his mother and his brothers and his own brutal treatment in the Revolution. And besides all this, Jackson was Irish enough—not Scotch—to be exceedingly glad of the humiliation of the hereditary enemy of his race.

In commemorating the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans the fires of patriotism that burn within our hearts bespeak a love and admiration that will perpetually immortalize the gallant Andrew Jackson, and reflect a recollection of lasting reverence for the soldiers who stopped the English hordes and General Pakenham from taking possession of the key city to the Mississippi Valley.

We need but glance over the pages of history and compare the casualties of the opposing armies—Americans 75, the enemy 2,000. The comparison in itself is a tribute to the master strategy of General Jackson and a tribute to the undaunted courage of the handful of American warriors who so successfully and severely repulsed the invaders.

But today we look with honest pride at the tranquillity existing between the English-speaking nations.

So, in solemn salutation and firm reverence, we honor Andrew Jackson and the brave soldiers of the plains of Chalmette. Oh, yes; we honor in deep sorrow and in fervent respect the valiant soldiers who shed their blood on the battlefield of New Orleans—Chalmette; and we say to these who have passed on to the Great Beyond that we of today shall carry the Battle of New Orleans and the Mississippi Valley to the heights of modern progress, advancement, and safety, that you and your comrades fought so valiantly to preserve.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, with crime and criminals in this country on the run in the last few months, and having the distinguished pleasure of representing what is considered the safest city in the United States, I noted with a great deal of pleasure that some weeks ago the chief of police of my city of Milwaukee, Jacob G. Laubenheimer, was awarded an honor that has been given to but few Americans. He is the only law-enforcement officer to ever receive the gold key of the Civitan Club, the only other recipients being Colonel Lindbergh, Orville Wright, Thomas Edison, General Pershing, Sergeant York, and Margaret McKenney. Today there appeared in the Hearst papers an article written by Chief Laudenheimer containing some valuable suggestions on what must be done to successfully uproot and eliminate crime in our great cities. I ask unanimous consent that this article, with the editorial explanation of its purpose, be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to object. I do not think the RECORD should be filled with newspaper clippings or editorial comments. Therefore I object. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not a place to be filled with newspaper clippings, editorial comments, letters, telegrams, and so forth.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I shall revise that request. This article was written by the chief of police of the city of Milwaukee, and I shall include a copy of the original manuscript rather than the newspaper article if the gentleman objects to the news clipping.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think we may as well establish the precedent early in the session. If we are going to let one man put such things in the RECORD, then we should let all do it. I think the House should decide whether it wants to let all editorials, letters, and so forth, go in, and I think that should be decided now. Personally I think the RECORD should be confined to the proceedings of the House and that extraneous matter should be left out. However, if the House thinks differently, well and good, but let us decide now and stick to it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Does the gentleman intend to read this article into the RECORD? If he does, I shall object.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I intend to request that the Clerk read it.

Mr. SNELL. That is the same thing.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Then if that is the purpose of the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey objects.

UPPER CAROLINA DEVELOPMENT

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. I have asked these few minutes to call to the attention of the Members of the House the report of the National Resources Board, filed on December 17, because it contains, in my judgment, the foundation for a national planning system that will mean a great deal for the future of this Nation.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by calling attention to the original planning system, in harmony with the principles of the recommendations of the National Resources Board, known as the Upper Carolina Development Association, and to include in connection with my remarks letters from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior and other public officers in connection with this work of the Upper Carolina Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes after the President had finished reading his marvelous message to the Congress on January 4, 1935, I issued the following statement to the press:

The message of President Roosevelt to the Congress today is the natural sequel to his message of June 8, 1934. It breathes the same sentiment of devotion to humanity. It is inspired by the same ideals for American democracy. It challenges the spirit of independence, but also chides the spirit of selfishness. It arouses the best in rugged individualism and denounces the worst in private initiative. It stimulates endeavor for home ownership and personal independence, while it forecasts the overthrow of monopoly and foretells the end of predatory control over the sources of the people's life.

After the message of the President of June 8, 1934, I made some remarks in the House of Representatives on June 13, 1934, in which I used the following language:

Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the vision of brighter and better days laid before us by the message of the President on June 8 is the solemn promise of "a President who gets things done", of the realization of a just and fair economic system for the American people. The burning words of the President bring out into bold relief in my mind thoughts that have been somewhat hazy and uncertain for many years.

During these years I have contemplated for upper South Carolina a great movement of cooperation for its development through diversified industry and diversified agriculture. Now is the time for us to act. If we will organize as hereinafter indicated and present to the President at the next session of Congress a definite and concrete plan for carrying out his great program, then I have every confidence that our section will be among the first to receive the stimulus and benefits that he intends to confer here and there, until finally the whole Nation will be organized into one mighty cooperative movement among all people, all industries, and all activities, and thereby all American citizens enjoy to the fullest measure possible that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" contemplated by the American Declaration of Independence.

At the conclusion of those remarks I gave the following summary of the aims and purposes of the Upper Carolina Development Association:

The following summary of objects and results that can and should be accomplished by the organization of an upper Carolina development association, in order to be ready to offer a definite program to President Roosevelt and the next Congress, is as follows:

First. More subsistence homestead projects situate near all the cities, towns, and large industrial establishments.

Second. Ample financial assistance to city and industrial workers to establish themselves on small and independent farms, with ample conveniences of light and water.

Third. Financial help to heads of families in building, rebuilding, and improving homes, whether situated in cities, towns, suburbs, or country.

Fourth. Financial aid for the establishment of new, small, and diversified industries.

Fifth. Financial assistance to small industries and business concerns to keep them going, to employ labor, and to enlarge their activities.

Sixth. More projects of demonstration in soil-erosion control and in soil building and in converting waste land into grazing land.

Seventh. Additional projects of reforestation on submarginal lands bought by the Government to be taken out of production.

Eighth. Employment and use in sufficiently large numbers of leaders and instructors in all forms of diversified agriculture, such as fruits, vegetables, milk, cattle, grain, grasses, etc., etc.

Ninth. Farm marketing centers, at least one in each county, including canneries, creameries, meat processing plants, cold storage, egg and poultry assembling plants, to give a market at the top price any day in the year for anything the farmer has to sell.

Tenth. Coordination through plans and committees for cooperation between merchants, farmers, factories, schools, and all other public enterprises, to insure the highest efficiency in every enterprise and project included within the association.

Eleventh. Cheaper power, cheaper fertilizer, lower rates of interest, better prices for all products, and steady employment for all persons willing to work, even including students during vacation season, when canneries are busy.

Twelfth. Consequently, we will have for upper Carolina better schools and churches, better homes in the city, town, and country, all finally free from mortgages, and as a result of the whole program a prosperous and happy people.

The message of the President of January 4, 1935, contains the following language showing its complete harmony with the aims and purposes of the association formed by some of the patriotic citizens of the Piedmont section of South Carolina:

This work will cover a wide field, including clearance of slums, which for adequate reasons cannot be undertaken by private capital; in rural housing of several kinds, where again private capital is unable to function; in rural electrification; in the reforestation of the great watersheds of the Nation; in an intensified program to prevent soil erosion and to reclaim blighted areas; in improving existing road systems, and in constructing national highways designed to handle modern traffic; in the elimination of grade crossings; in the extension and enlargement of the successful work of the Civilian Conservation Corps; in non-Federal work, mostly self-liquidating and highly useful to local divisions of government; and on many others which the Nation needs and cannot afford to neglect.

This is the method which I propose to you in order that we may better meet this present-day problem of unemployment. Its greatest advantage is that it fits logically and usefully into the long-range permanent policy of providing the three types of security which constitute as a whole an American plan for the American people.

On November 10, 1934, there met at Spartanburg, S. C., pursuant to invitation issued by myself, a large number of citizens representing different counties of the Third Congressional District, represented by the Honorable JOHN C. TAYLOR, of the Fourth Congressional District, represented by myself, and of the Fifth Congressional District, represented by the Honorable JAMES P. RICHARDS. At that meeting a voluntary organization or association was formed for the purpose of promoting the development of all of the varied interests of upper Carolina, and the following committees were appointed and have entered most enthusiastically upon their duties: Crop diversification and marketing, soil erosion and reforestation, water power and rural electrification, new industries, applied education, and publicity and legislation.

UPPER CAROLINA DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

Organized at Spartanburg, S. C., November 10, 1934

Crop diversification and marketing: R. E. Johnson, Gaffney; T. E. Keitt, Newberry; Ross Hambright, Kings Creek; B. M. Gramling, Gramling; T. W. Stansell, route no. 3, Pelzer; Robert Harris, Gray Court; R. D. McDonald, route no. 4, Westminster; Mr. Marrett, Marrett Seed Co., Westminster; C. O. Hearon, Spartanburg; W. H. Nicholson, Greenwood.

Soil erosion and reforestation: T. L. Johnson, Rock Hill; J. Frank McCluney, Gaffney; J. Marvin Joyce, Greenwood; J. Wade Drake, Anderson; Bernard Henderson, Waterloo; J. Strom Thurmond, Edgefield; Richard F. Watson, Greenville.

Water power and rural electrification: Dan T. Duncan, Greenwood; Roy Pennell, Spartanburg; Leon L. Rice, Anderson; L. G. Young, Union; W. R. Bradford, Fort Mill; B. F. Rush, Greenville; S. J. Hunt, Mountville.

New industries: C. L. Cobb, Rock Hill; J. A. Mitchell, Anderson; H. P. Beam, Pelzer; Joe F. Park, Greenwood; T. M. Marchant, Greenville; W. W. Harris, Clinton; H. C. Moore, Gaffney.

Applied education: J. B. Douthit, Pendleton; W. H. Washington, Clemson College; Professor Thomasson, Rock Hill; W. H. Stallworth, Spartanburg; Dr. R. C. Granberry, Gaffney; Prof. C. K. Wright, Laurens; H. A. Woodle, Edgefield.

Publicity and legislation: D. A. D. Outz, Greenwood; W. S. Hall, Gaffney; W. E. Hall, Anderson; E. P. Wideman, Greenwood; C. H. Garrison, Greenville; A. G. Keeney, Spartanburg; E. M. Rice, Union.

On January 4, 1932, I introduced House Joint Resolution 170, of which the following is a copy:

Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a nonpartisan board of 25 members to study and report conclusions upon ways, means, and methods to rehabilitate business conditions

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint 25 citizens of the United States to constitute the National Advisory Board, to be a nonpartisan body, representing all the sections, industries, interests, and businesses of the people of all parts of the United States. Five of said persons shall be appointed for 2 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for 8 years; and 5 of said persons for a term of 4 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 6 years; and 5 of said persons shall be appointed for a term of 6 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 4 years; and 5 of said persons for a term of 8 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 2 years; and 5 of said persons shall be appointed for a term of 10 years; and if any of such persons die, resign, or become otherwise disqualified, the President shall, if necessary, remove them from office and appoint their successors for the unexpired portion of the term involved. All of said persons shall serve without any salary, or commission, or compensation, but shall receive the actual expenses of travel and subsistence while attending the meetings of the board, or the meetings of any subcommittee lawfully appointed by the board. Immediately after the President shall notify the persons of their appointments under this act he shall set a time and place for a meeting for organization, and when not less than 10 such persons shall meet they shall organize by electing one of their number as chairman, and four of their number as vice chairmen, and by electing one of their number as secretary, and all warrants and expenses herein authorized shall be drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States by the chairman, or by one of the vice chairmen, duly authorized and countersigned by the secretary of the board.

SEC. 2. After the board shall organize it shall proceed to carry out the powers and duties hereinafter outlined, and shall appoint an executive committee of 5 members, and subcommittees, consisting of not less than 3 nor more than 5 members thereof, to consider international trade, intranational trade, manufactures, agriculture, banking, finances, and exchanges, building industries and home ownership, education, carriers by rail, by highway, by water, and by air, and all carriers of intelligence, and of such other subjects as shall appear to the board to be expedient.

SEC. 3. For the first year of the life of the board it shall meet every 3 months at such places as the board may decide on at the next previous meeting, except that the President of the United States shall designate the time and place of the first meeting. Thereafter the board shall meet annually at a time and place fixed by the executive committee, and the attendance of 10 members shall be necessary to constitute a quorum to transact business binding members not present, but a smaller number than 10 may consider the business before the board and make recommendations by mail to all the members thereof not present, and shall consider them at the next meeting.

SEC. 4. The said board shall make an annual report in writing to the President of the United States on or before December 1 of each and every year, and the President shall transmit said report, together with any statistics or information that may be submitted along with the report, to the Congress of the United States. The board is authorized to employ clerical services, to organize a secretariat, and to purchase necessary stationery and office equipment and to incur printing bills, and appropriations by the Congress not exceeding $25,000 a year are hereby authorized.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Department of Commerce is hereby authorized to furnish office space and such clerical assistance and office equipment as he conveniently can for the use of the board, and the President of the United States is authorized to detail the services of any officer, agent, or employee of the Government of the United States from any department to the board to assist the board in carrying on its work. Furthermore, the board shall have power to demand assistance and services from any executive or independent office or bureau of the United States Government, and it shall be the duty of such Federal agency to comply with such demand, unless excused from doing so by order of the President of the United States. The board is authorized to request information and statistics from State governments and subdivisions thereof, and from any private source, and to use the information and statistics so obtained in its studies as hereinafter contemplated.

SEC. 6. It shall be the duty and purpose of said board to study and to report conclusions upon ways, means, and methods to rehabilitate business conditions in the United States, and to place the same upon a sound, stable, and permanent basis of prosperity. Said board may make recommendations as to the coordination of various branches of industry, agriculture, mining, lumbering, and of the other activities constituting the business of the Nation, and this coordination shall have in view the condition of commerce and business in and with the other nations of the world.

Accordingly I was very happy indeed to find that President Roosevelt had appointed a number of Federal officers and citizens having no official connection with the Government to constitute the National Resources Board. That Board consisted of the following personnel: Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, chairman; George H. Dern, Secretary of War; Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture; Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce; Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor; Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator; Frederic A. Delano; Charles E. Merriam; Wesley C. Mitchell.

I followed the work of this Board as best I could from a distance and awaited with great solicitude their report, which was filed on December 1, 1934, and released on December 17. It is a very remarkable outline of some of the most pressing problems related to our national economic life. I call especial attention to the two following extracts. The first relates to the general outline of Nation-wide planning as follows:

The natural resources of America are the heritage of the whole Nation and should be conserved and utilized for the benefit of all of our people. Our national democracy is built upon the principle that the gains of our civilization are essentially mass gains and should be administered for the benefit of the many rather than the few; our priceless resources of soil, water, minerals are for the service of the American people, for the promotion of the welfare and well-being of all citizens. The present study of our natural resources is carried through in this spirit and with a desire to make this principle a living fact in America.

Unfortunately this principle has not always been followed even when declared; on the contrary, there has been tragic waste and loss of resources and human labor and wide-spread spoliation and misuse of the natural wealth of the many by the few.

The conservation movement, begun a quarter of a century ago, marked the beginning of an organized national effort to protect and develop these assets, and this national policy was aided in many instances by the individual States. To some extent the shameful waste of timber, oil, soil, and minerals has been halted, although with terrible exceptions where ignorance, inattention, or greed has devastated our heritage almost beyond belief.

This report of the President's National Resources Board brings together, for the first time in our history, exhaustive studies by highly competent inquirers of land use, water use, minerals, and related public works in their relation to each other and to national planning. The report lays the basis of a comprehensive long-range national policy for the conservation and development of our fabulous natural resources. If the recommendations contained herein are put into effect it is believed that they will end the untold waste of our national domain now, and will measurably enrich and enlarge these national treasures as time goes on.

An examination of the reports upon land, water, minerals, and public works, respectively, shows the importance of considering these special factors in their relations to one another and to economic and governmental problems as well. Water policies and land policies cannot be planned except as taken together, and evidently minerals cannot be considered apart from land in a planning program. Erosion is a problem of land and water; afforestation is likewise a problem of land and water.

The second quotation relates to the subject of local or national planning to be in harmony with the Nation-wide plan.

INTERSTATE AND REGIONAL PLANNING

Besides the extraordinary growth of the State planning movement in the last year, or perhaps because of it, new interest has been aroused in interstate or regional planning organization.

Through regional advisers of the Public Works Administration, and later through the district chairman of the National Resources Board, an informal contact was established for interstate collaboration on joint planning projects. In two regions these informal contacts developed into more complete organizations or regional planning commissions. Both the New England and the Pacific Northwest planning agencies are composed of representatives of the State planning agencies with other interested citizens, and in both cases large advisory committees have been set up to keep in touch with public opinion and to secure the help of Federal, State, and private organizations. Both of these commissions are served by consultants assigned from Washington, in the same manner as State planning consultants are assigned to State planning boards.

The New England Regional Planning Commission is loosely organized to adjust interstate problems rather than to initiate regional projects. It has grown directly out of previous planning studies fostered by the New England council and by the conference of Governors of the six States. It has no authority, but has already proven its value as a coordinating agency.

The planning work in the Pacific Northwest is much more centralized in the office of the district chairman because the major problem of the area affecting all four States is the Columbia River development at Grand Coulee and Bonneville. The organization developed by Mr. Marshall N. Dana is another agency again without specific legal authority but actively engaged in planning for the Columbia Basin, although in a fashion widely different from that of the Tennessee Valley Authority in the southern section of the United States.

These two new agencies, one based on history and custom, and the other on the unity of a great drainage basin, have been added in the last few months to the previous experiment going on in the Tennessee Valley and to such arrangements as the Colorado River compact, the Port of New York Authority, and similar agencies which have legal buttresses to support their planning work.

The Tennessee Valley Authority is in marked contrast to the New England and Pacific Northwest experiments in that its centralized planning is conducted entirely at an initial Federal expense to be later recouped. It is decentralized in area but not in jurisdiction, for it is a Federal authority without State participation. The Colorado River compact, on the other hand, has encountered difficulties because of failure to secure unanimous State cooperation. It is too soon to judge the relative merits of these or other ways of developing regional and interstate planning programs, but it is encouraging to find a variety of methods and a similarity of ultimate aim and such enthusiasm in widely separated parts of the country.

If further assistance is to be provided in the form of consultants to State planning boards, some kind of regional organization would seem to be essential to secure interstate cooperation. Until greater experience has been obtained in the various laboratories where trials are now being made, it would seem wise to try a variety of methods with Federal backing rather than to commit any large sum to repetition of the same experiment in several regions before the relative advantages of the various methods now under trial have been clearly demonstrated.

VARIETY OF REGIONS

Federal agencies have divided the country into regions or districts for administrative, planning, and other purposes with little or no attention to the divisions used by other bureaus. It is natural and perhaps inevitable that the special situations and needs of different agencies should result in drawing different boundaries for regional subdivisions of the "field." Studies of water, for instance, logically must be laid out along the lines of drainage basins, while others can use State lines and combinations of States. The Federal Reserve districts were arranged to include a certain number of banks of given capital.

If coordinated planning is to be successful, some degree of order must be brought out of the present chaos of regions and districts. It seems reasonable to suppose that a large number of Federal agencies could use the same regional divisions without serious detriment to their work. A careful analysis of the advantages and difficulties of using more uniform district boundaries in Federal planning and administration is a next step. It would be pedantic, of course, to let a desire for uniformity interfere with the varying requirements of different tasks; but many of the present confusing divisions of the country appear to have no justification beyond the traditions of the bureaus by which they are used.

On December 19, 1934, I addressed to President Roosevelt, for his information, the following letter:

DECEMBER 19, 1934.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The President, The White House,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have just received from Mr. Eliot, executive officer of the National Resources Board, an advance copy of the report of that body to you, dated December 1 but released on December 17.

I write to say that in my humble judgment the setting up of this Board of able and patriotic men with great vision and the work of this Board, pursuant to your Executive Order No. 6777, constitutes the greatest single accomplishment for the future of America that our history discloses since the formation and adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Our development has been purely haphazard, scrappy, and ragged. The result is that our national resources of forest, land, water, and minerals are in a ragged and scrappy condition. In the Seventy-second Congress I introduced a House joint resolution to set up a similar board to be comprised of 25 citizens from all sections of the country and from all callings and interests, and I offered the same resolution in the Seventy-third Congress, and it is designated as "House Joint Resolution No. 24."

Making a local application of this Nation-wide idea, I advocated the organization for a planning board for the Piedmont section of South Carolina in a speech dated June 13, 1934, and I enclose you a copy of same. A mass meeting of citizens from the Piedmont section of South Carolina was called by me and held in Spartanburg, S. C., on November 10, 1934. At that meeting an organization was formed and committees appointed, and I enclose you a copy of the list of the several committees designated at that meeting.

If the various States and various sections of States will fall in line with this Nation-wide planning, we can commence a movement that will revolutionize the economic life of our people within 10 years.

I am, therefore, earnestly asking you to commend to the Civilian Conservation Corps, the soil erosion service of the Interior Department, and the Forest Reserve of the Department of Agriculture, and the Subsistence Homestead Division, this work that we are seeking to do in South Carolina, and to suggest that they cooperate with each other in cooperating with us in putting over our program.

In other words, Mr. President, here we have in this part of South Carolina—with ideal climate and soil and population—an opportunity to make an immediate and successful demonstration of the principles upon which the studies of the National Resources Board are based. We are organized and ready to go, just as soon as we can get the necessary financial help. That help can be furnished in connection with the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and the other regular activities of the Forest Service and the soil erosion service without appreciable additional appropriation.

I sincerely hope that you may give me the opportunity to present very briefly, in a 10- or 15-minute interview, this all too sketchy description of what our people in upper South Carolina are trying to do.

With very great respect, I am,
Very respectfully,

J. J. MCSWAIN.

I sent a copy of my letter to the President to Mr. Eliot, executive officer of the National Resources Board, and received from him the following acknowledgment:

NATIONAL RESOURCES BOARD,
INTERIOR BUILDING,
Washington December 22, 1934.

The Honorable J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: Thank you for your good letter of December 20, sending me a copy of your letter to the President, together with a copy of your remarks from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the upper Carolina development.

I am bringing your letter and the enclosures to the attention of the Chairman of the Board, Secretary Ickes, and you will no doubt hear from him in due course.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES W. ELIOT, 2d,
Executive Officer, for the Chairman.

I also sent a copy of my letter to the President, to the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, and received from him the following reply:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 5, 1935.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I wish to acknowledge your kind letter of December 9, enclosing a copy of your communication to the President on the subject of the proposed development program for the Piedmont section of South Carolina.

I have read your interesting letter to the President with attention, and I note with satisfaction that your proposed plans for constructive development of the Piedmont portion of your State embody the element of wise planning in practical measures and operating programs. There should be no false steps in the working application of principles and practices under the guidance and direction of capable planning boards.

Please be assured that the agencies of this Department that are in a position to assist you and the people of South Carolina will cooperate whole-heartedly, within their limitations, in the accomplishment of such highly impressive and comprehensive programs. I shall be pleased to have you advise me of your progress from time to time.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

I sent to the Honorable H. A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, a copy of my letter to the President, and have received from him the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., December 21, 1934.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: Your letter of December 19 and the enclosed copy of your letter to the President I read with great interest. It is a pleasure to be thus reminded of your extraordinary interest in planned use of our national resources.

Not having detailed information of the plan for the Piedmont section of South Carolina, and therefore not knowing what kind of cooperation you may expect, I am unable to give definite assurances of the sort I should like to give, but within the scope of our authorizations I am sure that all our agencies will be glad to cooperate.

I am passing your letter on to Mr. Silcox with word that I hope he will find it possible to cooperate with you fully.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

I sent to Dr. L. C. Gray, chief of the land planting division of the National Resources Board, and received from him the following reply:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., December 26, 1934.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I wish to acknowledge your letter of December 20 and to thank you for sending me a copy of your letter to the President and the list of committees formed under the Upper Carolina Development Association. I am very glad, indeed, to note the progress you are making there in attempting to correlate the program of South Carolina with the Federal land program.

I wish to assure you that I shall be glad to be of service to you in any way that is within my power.

Very truly yours,

L. C. GRAY,
Chief Land Policy Section,
Division of Program Planning.

I sent to Mr. R. A. Winston, technical secretary of the soil erosion service of the Department of the Interior, and have received from him the following reply:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
SOIL EROSION SERVICE,
Washington, December 22, 1934.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I have much pleasure in acknowledging your letter of December 20 to Dr. Bennett, with reference to the organization of the Upper Carolina Development Association, which has been sent to my desk for reply.

You will doubtless remember that I attended the meeting that inaugurated this organization and spoke to the assembly of representative business people of the Piedmont region of South Carolina on the general subject of soil erosion and measures of control. I wish again to restate to you our tremendous interest in the proposed program that you are endeavoring to inaugurate for that wonderful Piedmont country. We are heartily with you, and we stand read to do everything within our power to promote the conservation of our natural resources and the development of our community life.

I am suggesting that in lieu of a letter on the subject, that you arrange to give us an appointment after the holidays for a discussion of the subject involved in your communication. Might we not arrive at a better understanding and a better analysis of the problems ahead in a personal conference rather than in the exchange of letters?

Mr. Bennett is taking a much-needed vacation for a few days, and I would suggest that in the early days of January that you arrange so the three of us could sit in a conference for a discussion of the very interesting efforts that you are putting forth for the good of your State.

With good wishes and high personal regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,

R. A. WINSTON,
Technical Secretary.

I sent to Mr. F. A. Silcox, Forester, United States Department of Agriculture, a copy of my letter to the President, and have received from him the following reply:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, December 29, 1934.

Land-use planning.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I have been particularly interested in the letter which you addressed to Secretary Wallace concerning the organization in the Piedmont region of South Carolina of committees to carry out the basic principles and purposes laid down in the report of the National Resources Board. The whole-hearted cooperation of the local people is necessary to make effective the purposes of the report which was submitted to the President.

I am asking our regional forester, Mr. Kircher, who is stationed at Atlanta, to get directly in touch with you, so that he may acquaint himself with the work of the committees and extend his offer of cooperation. This is the first move. After he has gotten in touch with the local committees I shall be glad to follow through with him in action that may combine in a cooperative way the work of the different agencies you mention in your letter.

Again expressing for the Secretary and for myself appreciation of your great interest and that of the people in the Piedmont section in seeing that the purposes of the report may be effective, and assuring you that we will cooperate in every way possible, I am,

Sincerely yours,

F. A. SILCOX, Forester.

I sent to the Honorable Roy F. Hendrickson, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, a copy of my letter to the President, and have received the following reply:

DECEMBER 27, 1934.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: Mr. Wilson, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, is out of the city for a few days filling speaking engagements, and so I am acknowledging your letter of December 20 to him.

I know that he will be interested in the copy of the letter which you wrote to the President, together with your discussion on your proposal for establishing self-liquidating market centers in your State.

Sincerely yours,

ROY F. HENDRICKSON,
Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

Recently Mr. H. H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Erosion Service of the Department of the Interior, visited the soil erosion projects in the counties of Spartanburg and Greenville, in South Carolina, and I accompanied him through his tour of inspection over the work that has been done and is being done, and I commend, in the strongest terms, his sympathetic understanding of the urgent need for enlargement and extension of this work of soil-erosion control in Piedmont Carolina.

The following proposal for the control of soil erosion in Carolina has been prepared by the branch of that service located at Spartanburg, S. C., and under the general direction of Dr. T. S. Buie, and I endorse most strongly the outline proposed in that suggestion:

PROPOSED SOIL EROSION CONTROL PROJECT, SOUTH CAROLINA

Unrestrained soil erosion has so depleted the soils of South Carolina of their fertility that immediate action alone can prevent our soon having a State of abandoned farms and a peasant farm class endeavoring to eke out an existence on impoverished soil.

Under the situation that exists only heroic control measures will suffice. A comprehensive system of land utilization, which means a readjustment of farming practices combined with specific control measures is necessary. Steep and badly eroded hillsides must not be planted to crops such as cotton, corn, and tobacco, but must be rededicated to forest or solid-growing crops for pasturage or feed. The best efforts of both the engineering and agricultural professions must be employed to effect specific control.

Success of soil erosion control work in South Carolina is dependent upon the extent of the whole-hearted support and cooperation of the industrial, business, and professional interests of the State, in addition to the active participation of all agencies striving for the betterment of agriculture.

INTRODUCTION

Soil erosion is of more or less serious consequence in at least 33 of the 46 counties in South Carolina. In the upper Coastal Plain which has an elevation of from 50 to 150 feet above sea level there are certain fields which are of rolling topography and where erosion is becoming a problem. Through the Sand Hill section of the State which has an elevation ranging from 150 to 400 feet above sea level, a large part of the cultivated fields is sufficiently steep to require terracing. A few gullies are of such size as to necessitate control measures. The entire Piedmont section, which embraces approximately 40 percent of the land area of the State, is subject to erosion, much of this being of very severe nature. Practically all of the cultivated land is rolling and requires a variety of control measures. In this section are found many gullies, the number, size, and extent depending upon the local topography and soil type.

As an illustration of the existing situation may be mentioned the fact that in one county alone 90,000 acres have been abandoned as the result of erosion and 46,000 acres of fertile bottom land have been ruined by deposits of material washed down from above.

The average rainfall in South Carolina is approximately 50 inches per year, much of which falls as sudden thunder storms. This, together with the nature of the soil and elevation above sea level, results in a very rapid run-off from the fields and a rapid stream discharge. Data compiled by the Geological Survey indicate that approximately one-half of the water which falls finds its way to the larger streams in a short time and these streams reach flood stage and then return to normal very quickly. For instance, following a heavy rain a stream may rise to 20 or more times its usual flow and be back to normal stage again within less than 24 hours. The effect of such rapid run-off is to remove fertile soil from the fields and other areas, depositing it wherever the velocity of the stream is checked, either in a storage reservoir or at a lower stream grade.

The soils of the Piedmont section of South Carolina rapidly are becoming impoverished, and increasing areas of land are being abandoned each year as a result of erosion. A recent estimate by the county agricultural agents of this section indicates that the rate of abandonment of farm land due to erosion is at least 12,000 acres per county per year.

When the hills of the Piedmont were cleared and put into cultivation they were covered by a gray, sandy clay topsoil of fair fertility. The effect of continuous cultivation of intertilled crops with little or no attention paid to adequate erosion control measures has been to denude the slopes of this mantle of surface soil so that now the red clay subsoil is exposed. In many places this is all that the farmer has upon which to depend for his living. Farming on subsoil land has been termed "bankrupt farming on bankrupt land." The family dependent on such a type of agriculture is doomed to privation and want because it is impossible to produce profitable crops on badly eroded hillsides.

The accompanying pictures taken in Spartanburg and Greenville Counties illustrate this fact and show what we rapidly are approaching and what the appearance of much of the Piedmont area will be like within the near future unless something is done to combat this menace. The basic support of organized society in South Carolina is the business of producing cash crops and livestock by farmers. The very foundation of profitable agriculture thus is threatened by the depletion of the soil by erosion. When erosion of the surface soil reaches a certain point the balance of fertility cannot be maintained. Surface soil cannot be purchased by the farmer, neither can subsoil be made productive except by a slow process of crop rotation. Farmers are unable to employ commercial fertilizer or green manure crops to replace the surface soil so as to produce profitable crops. In most cases erosion is progressing faster than the farmer is able to counteract it by good farm practice, and as a result many farms are being lost by the owners and counties are suffering from inability to collect taxes on farm land.

A recent survey of several school districts in a Piedmont county of this State showed that the percentage of taxes which became delinquent for the past 5 years was twice as great in those districts bordering along streams where the topography is rough than was the case in nearby districts lying on the ridge between two streams and where the erosion, although extensive, was not nearly so serious. The farmers in the two groups of school districts in question were uniform as to experience, ability, energy, honesty, and willingness to pay taxes, if possible. The increasing failure of farm property to bear its just share of taxation is having a serious effect upon industry and other lines of activity, necessitating the development of new sources of taxation.

A competent soils expert in the employ of the Government recently made a survey of approximately 2,500 acres of land in the upper Piedmont section of South Carolina paying particular attention to the classification of the land according to the presence or absence of the original gray surface soil, which is an indication of the stage of erosion. The result of this survey shows that only approximately 10 percent of the area was not seriously eroded and, therefore, comparable with the soil as it originally existed. Approximately 38 percent of the area, while still maintained in cultivation, had had a large amount of the surface soil removed—hence its productivity was materially lessened. On 21 percent practically all the surface soil had been removed by erosion, leaving only the base unproductive material for farming purposes. On almost one-third of the land, sheet erosion and gullying had rendered it practically worthless for the production of crops. This is not an extreme case, but is typical of the situation in at least 14 of the western counties of South Carolina.

Business and professional men, as well as landowners, are vitally interested in the menace of soil erosion, for if the farmer is unable to make a profit on his farm, the burden of taxation is going to fall on the business, professional, and industrial groups. The history of the world shows that the civilization of the country cannot be maintained at a higher level than the productiveness of the soil will support.

STATEMENT OF PROBLEM

In an effort to classify the extent of soil erosion in the State of South Carolina, a grouping has been made of the counties as to the nature and extent of erosion. Those 13 counties, constituting the lower Coastal Plain, or eastern part of the State, have practically a level topography, and as a result there is no soil erosion of consequence. The remaining 33 counties, however, are subject to more or less erosion, the extent of which has been classified as follows:

In group 1, indicated on the accompanying map, erosion is not serious, although certain sections of each county are sufficiently rolling to justify and necessitate terracing. Occasionally small gullies are found, but these are not large enough to be beyond the control of the individual landowners.

In group 2, composed of five counties extending in a belt across the center of the State and embracing the Sand Hill region, erosion is more serious. This is due to the rolling topography of the Sand Hill region, together with the light nature and loose incoherent structure of the soil. In each of these five counties there is a certain portion of the land which is sufficiently rolling as to necessitate control measures. These should consist of terracing, strip cropping, and withdrawal of the steeper slopes from cultivation. In this region gullying is more extensive, although the gullies are neither so wide-spread nor large as to be of serious consequence as yet. In addition to the land that is affected by soil erosion, there is a considerable amount of land in this section that is being abandoned for production of cash crops due to its unproductiveness.

Group 3 consists of two counties which have a larger portion of their respective areas subject to extensive erosion. While these two counties extend into the Coastal Plain, they are predominantly Piedmont, with a consequent greater erosion problem than exists in the Coastal Plain.

In the nine counties comprising group 4 erosion is serious and wide-spread over the entire area. All the cultivated fields require control measures, such as terracing and strip cropping, and gullies are numerous, especially on the rough land near streams. A considerable portion of the formerly cultivated land in these counties already has been abandoned on account of erosion.

In the seven counties comprising group 5 the stage of erosion may be classified as extreme, particularly near the streams, where the topography is rougher. All the cultivated fields require terracing and strip cropping. Many extensive gullies, which may be 50 feet or more in depth and 1,000 feet or more in length, are found in these counties. There is much abandoned land in this area, particularly among the streams. In their desire to plant more land to cultivated row crops, such as cotton and corn, the farmers of this area have cleared steep slopes, which at best can produce but a few profitable crops. The only hope for profitable permanent utilization of slopes above 12 percent in this area is in reforestation or permanent pasturage.

The accompanying map which is reproduced from one prepared by H. H. Bennett, director of the soil erosion service, shows the general extent of erosion in the State without regard to county lines.

SYSTEM OF AGRICULTURE

In table no. 1 is shown by counties the total land area, the area in farms, the crop land, and the idle land in acres, as reported in the 1930 census. Thus it will be noted that the total land area in these 33 counties is nearly 13,000,000 acres, of which approximately 8,000,000 acres is included in farms, and about one-half of this is classified as crop land. Of this somewhat more than 4,000,000 acres of crop land approximately two-thirds of a million acres were classified as idle. This figure is not a true indication of the land abandoned due to erosion for it included abandonment due to other causes; and, on the other hand, there is much land now being cultivated which is too steep and should be devoted to other uses. It should be remembered, too, that these figures were compiled from the 1929 crop year, since when there has been a marked change in the agricultural situation in this country. Much marginal and submarginal land has gone out of cultivation, the county agents' estimate of which referred to above would make a considerable addition to this value.

The crops grown on the land in cultivation include to a marked degree the extent of erosion. As experiments show, the amount of soil removed by a given rain from a pasture area is only a small fraction of what will be lost from a field of similar slope planted to cotton or corn. Cotton, corn, and tobacco being clean cultivated crops may be considered as the real producers of erosion.

In table 2 is shown the acreage of these erosion producing crops by counties as well as the number of acres of crop land devoted to other uses.

It will be noted that the ratio of erosion producing crops to erosion resisting crops is very high, being approximately 8 to 1 for the State at large. In Greenville County, for instance, 83 percent of the crop land in 1929 was planted to the erosion producing crops—cotton and corn. Almost exactly 75 percent of the total crop land of the 33 counties under consideration was planted to cotton, corn, or tobacco.

ESTIMATE OF WORK NEEDED

In table 3 is shown the estimate of the total land area by counties and groups of counties which is of such topography as to necessitate terracing and also the estimated area which at this time require reterracing because of improper construction of the present terraces. For instance, it is estimated that in the group of Coastal Plain counties, 5 percent of the total area in crops should be terraced and that 3 percent requires reterracing at this time. Likewise, corresponding figures for group 2, or the Sand Hill counties, were 15 and 5, respectively. In group 3, or the two intermediate counties, the estimate was that 20 percent of the crop land should be terraced and 8 percent would require reterracing at this time. In the erosive Piedmont counties, or group 4, it was estimated that 80 percent of the total land in the crops should be terraced, and of this one-half would require reterracing at this time. In the section of the Piedmont where soil erosion is most severe, group 5, it was estimated that 90 to 100 percent of the crop land should be terraced and that 70 percent would require reterracing at this time. For the State at large, this means 1,966,520 acres of crop land of rolling topography and 1,136,836 acres requiring reterracing at this time. This is an estimate only and cannot be taken otherwise.

In table 4 is given an estimate by counties and groups of counties of the number of gullies in the farm land of the respective areas. So far as is known, no previous effort ever has been made to estimate the number of gullies in the State. It was decided that the gullies in the Coastal Plain counties, or group 1, were insufficient in size and extent to be seriously considered; therefore, gullying in this group of 10 counties has been ignored. There will be found an occasional gully, but the number is not sufficient to be taken seriously, as the individual landowners can effect control.

In the group of five Sand Hill counties it was estimated that there is 1 gully to each 2,000 acres, and the size ranges up to approximately 10 feet wide, 10 feet deep, and 200 feet or more long.

In the two counties constituting group 3 it was estimated that there is 1 gully to each 500 acres of farm land, and that the typical size here is 15 feet wide, 15 feet deep, and 500 feet long. The calculations were based on an average length of 300 feet.

In group 4, comprising nine counties, it was estimated that there is 1 major gully to each 200 acres, and that these range up to 30 feet in width, 30 feet in depth, and 700 feet long. The typical length was taken at 400 feet.

In that group of counties where erosion is most serious it was estimated that there is 1 major gully to each 100 acres of farm land, and that these gullies range up to 50 feet in depth, 50 feet in width, and 1,000 feet long. The typical length here was taken at 500 feet.

To those who are familiar with the various counties it is evident that gullying is much more extensive in Chester, Fairfield, and Union Counties than elsewhere. Also in these counties there is a smaller proportion of the total land area reported as being in farms. Accordingly the estimate of gullies for these three counties was based on total land area rather than acres in farm land.

Gully stabilization will consist of a small amount of sloping of the banks so that plantings may be established, and the construction of low woven-wire check dams at intervals in the floor of the gully to check further cutting. In calculating the number of dams necessary, 1 was allowed to each 20 estimated linear feet, and 20 linear feet of wire was allowed for each dam. As will be noted from table 4, the total number of gullies in the State is estimated at 35,650 and the number of dams necessary to check these gullies estimated at 816,275. It should be borne in mind that this is an estimate only, made from general knowledge of the State and not from a survey.

In calculating the number of acres which will need to be reforested due to erosion, it was decided that in group 1 no appreciable quantity of land had been sufficiently eroded to require abandonment and reforestation. The areas in this section which should be reforested did not reach their present condition as the result of erosion. In group 2 it was estimated that 5 percent of the land in the farm area should be rededicated to forest use as a result of erosion. Similar figures of 10, 15, and 20 were assumed for the other three groups of counties, respectively. The total area in these 33 counties which should be reforested as a result of the present stage of erosion is estimated as 803,029 acres. This does not in any measure represent the total acreage which should be rededicated to forest purposes. There is much land which has been abandoned because of depleted fertility and unprofitable yields, together with many thousands of other acres which are being cultivated at the present time but which are too steep for profitable use and should be returned to forests. The figure given is a minimum and could easily be doubled and be a fair estimate. The State forestry commission is preparing further data on reforestation.

For adequate soil-erosion control, terracing is insufficient and it is necessary to give particular attention to the growing of close-rooted, uncultivated crops, such as Lespedeza, winter legumes, sorghum, sudan grass, etc. These crops best may be planted in alternate strips following the contour, and it is estimated that the same amount of land which will require reterracing should be planted to strip crops.

PLAN OF ACTION

In order to combat this menace of soil erosion, which is active over so large a portion of South Carolina with resultant serious consequence, it is proposed that a systematic soil-erosion control program be initiated in each of these 33 counties. Such an activity will have the twofold advantage of providing employment for a large number of workers and at the same time be of incalculable value to the agriculture of the State. It would appear logical so to utilize funds appropriated for relief purposes that their expenditure would result in the conservation and constructive improvement of the greatest of all our natural resources—the soil.

It is proposed that this work be undertaken under the technical direction and supervision of the soil erosion service of the Department of the Interior, operating in cooperation with the proper agency or agencies of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and with the various local agricultural interests of the State acting in advisory capacities. The soil erosion service would be responsible for the employment of skilled personnel to direct the technical phases of the work; and the Federal Emergency Relief Administration would supply the necessary funds for payment of such personnel, the necessary equipment and materials with which to conduct the work, and ordinary labor from the several county relief rolls. Such agencies as the Agricultural Extension Service, the Agricultural Experiment Station, the State land-grant college, the State commissioner of agriculture, the State forestry commission, the vocational agricultural teachers, and others interested in the agricultural development of the State would contribute their influence and assistance to the program.

This activity should embrace all phases of a constructive soil-erosion control program with particular attention paid to the terracing and strip cropping of those fields of rolling topography; the control of gully erosion, which represents a later stage of erosion; and the reforestation of steep slopes and badly eroded areas, which already have been withdrawn from cultivation, or which by reason of their present condition should be withdrawn immediately.

To be successful such a plan must embrace the following:

1. Complete freedom from outside pressure of the selection of technical and supervisory personnel. Many of these necessarily must be secured from sources other than the local relief rolls, although all should be bona fide residents of the State.

2. A constant supply of labor must be provided, or at least the labor supplied should be as nearly constant over long periods as is possible and not fluctuate from week to week if the most efficient utilization of the supervisory personnel is to be secured.

The plan proposed embraces a 5-year program, certain phases of which would be conducted continuously, but other phases can be adapted to the local supply of relief labor and to other controlling factors.

TERRACING AND STRIP-CROPPING PROGRAM

As indicated in table 3, it is estimated that the area now requiring reterracing if an effective soil program is to be initiated, totals somewhat more than 1,000,000 acres. With the proper organization as developed herein, it is estimated that these fields can be surveyed for terracing at a cost of approximately 25 cents per acre, which does not include general overhead and cost of implements and equipment. This estimate is based on the cost of similar work done on the South Tiger River erosion-control project in 1934.

It is suggested that in this work crews of three men be used, one of whom should be a trained engineer, the second a rodman, and the third a man supplied by the farmer to drive stakes, etc. The engineer and rodman would be paid salaries of $90 and $65 per month, respectively.

Terracing is seasonal; therefore, it is estimated that this work might be done from October 1 to March 31, or a period of 6 months each year. It is estimated further that one crew could survey terrace lines for 20 acres each day for about 120 days each year. The total cost of such surveys and supervision of construction is shown in table 6 as $934,643, or approximately 82 cents per acre. This includes the cost of necessary equipment for the use of the farmer.

The type of terrace suggested is one with a broad base, having a well-constructed water channel on the upper side. In the preparation of this terrace most of the soil is removed from the water channel to construct the mound or ridge. This is an adaptation of the Mangum terrace by Prof. M. L. Nichols, of the Alabama Experiment Station and one which has proved very successful where used. In the construction of these terraces, the recommendations of the United States Department of Agriculture as to grade and vertical interval would be followed.

In the actual construction of the terraces the landowner, or operator, should be required to build the terraces within a reasonable time and under the general direction of supervisors trained for that purpose. In this work he would use his own teams, or in case he did not have sufficient horsepower, secure same by combining with neighbors. The equipment for the actual construction of the terraces in most cases would have to be supplied by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration on a loan basis. In general the type of equipment used would be a small wheel steel terrace grader requiring four horses. Such machines can be secured for approximately $75 each, and one such machine would be sufficient to construct terraces on an average of 400 acres annually. It is estimated that the allowance of 50 cents per acre would be ample to cover the cost of this equipment. These machines would remain the property of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and be subject to the direction and instructions issued by the local engineer in charge. The cost of this equipment is covered in (24) of the estimate. Each cooperating farmer would be required to sign an agreement to maintain the terraces as constructed for a minimum period of 5 years.

In the analysis of the cost of terracing, an organization capable of completing the work in 30 months (6 months each of 5 years) has been suggested. In many cases it will be more desirable to concentrate activities on this phase of the control program so that the terracing might be completed in a shorter time, possibly 2 years. This should not affect the total expenditure, however.

In many fields terracing alone is insufficient to control erosion and strip cropping is recommended as a companion practice to accompany terracing. In connection with the strip-cropping program, it is highly desirable that these rolling fields which are to be planted to cultivated crops should be stripped with close growing crops, such as Lespedeza, sudan grass, sorghum, or winter small grains. It is estimated that while the areas to be reterraced and stripped are not exactly identical, they are of about the same extent and in most cases would overlap. It is further estimated that the cost of seed for stripping will be about 50 cents per acre for spring crops, and 30 cents per acre for fall crops. These will not represent annual expenditures, however, as in most cases the landowner will be able to save his own seed after the first year. The total cost of the strip cropping is slightly in excess of $1,000,000, over 90 percent of which is for seed. The farmer himself would do the work under the direction of trained supervisors.

GULLY-CONTROL ACTIVITIES

In the gully-control work every effort would be made to use all local labor available from relief sources. The general plan adopted in the gully-control program is to develop a coordinated system for handling the water from the time it falls on the ground until it reaches grade level of a stream. This necessitates terrace outlets of a permanent nature and the building of low check dams across the bottom of each gully at specific intervals. In general, the method employed will be to use local materials such as stone or logs, where available, and where such cannot be secured woven wire 24 inches in width will be used. The cooperating farmer will be required to furnish all local materials, such as stone and timber, and transport same to the gully without cost to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. In the construction of these dams the principles as outlined and developed by the soil erosion experiment stations of the Department of Agriculture and the soil erosion service of the Department of the Interior will be employed. In general, the method used will be to keep the water spread in a thin sheet and to further reduce its velocity by having check dams not more than 2 feet in height.

As indicated in tables 4 and 8, it is estimated that there are a minimum of 35,000 gullies which would require approximately 800,000 dams as a minimum. It has been further estimated that 20 linear feet of wire would be required for each dam and that this would cost, together with sufficient staples, etc., 80 cents per dam, or approximately $653,000, for such material. It is also estimated that these dams would require approximately 5 days of labor each to construct, which means 4,000,000 days of labor distributed over the 5-year period. Expressed differently, this would necessitate the employment of somewhat less than 7,000 laborers for a period of 120 days each year for 5 years. The gully-control work is one phase of soil-erosion control which can be carried on intermittently and adjusted to the available supply of labor.

Fundamental in gully control is the development of a vegetative covering for the dams and banks, and particularly adapted for this purpose are Bermuda grass, honeysuckle, privet, wild plums, black locust, etc. All of these are to be found on practically every farm in South Carolina and can be transplanted in the gully with but little cost. It is felt that each farmer would be willing to do this transplanting if properly directed by those in charge. Such plantings are very important factors in the proper control of water in gullies and each landowner should be informed that they are a part of the program and that he would be required to agree to carry out the plans laid down by the soil erosion service before any actual work was done on his farm. The landowner would be further responsible for the maintenance of any structures, such as dams or terrace outlets, which might require replacement within 5 years.

It should be distinctly understood that no effort would be made to reclaim the land in gullies, but simply conserve the existing farm land and prevent the further expansion of the gully, which would result in the destruction of other areas. In the case of shallow gullies where silting and filling up is rapid, the landowner would not be permitted to use such reclaimed area for the production of cash crops without the consent of the proper agency.

FORESTRY

Much of the land which, as a result of erosion, either already has been abandoned or is in the process of being abandoned, should be planted to trees. Several species of pine and black locust are particularly adapted to this use. It is estimated that in the 33 counties there are 808,000 acres which have been so depleted of productivity by soil erosion that they should be planted to trees. This area should be added to those other areas which have been abandoned by reason of depleted fertility and which are to be reforested also. Details of the reforestation program are being prepared by the State forestry commission and are to be made a part of this consolidated report.

SUMMARY OF COSTS

In table 9 is given a summary of all costs pertaining to this project, which includes the number of employees for each position, the rate of pay, and time to be employed, as well as the total 5-year cost, the annual cost, and the percentage of the total for each item.

The item numbers refer to the explanation given in the explanation of costs, which are indicated in the several tables.

It will be noted from table 9 that 79.4 of the total estimated expenditure is for personal service, and that practically two-thirds, or 65 percent, is for common labor employed from relief rolls. Only 2 percent of the total is for travel and 1.5 percent for office rent and upkeep. Necessary supplies and equipment is estimated at 17.1 percent.

As shown in table 10, which presents a somewhat different distribution, only 5 percent is for salaries of those in strictly technical and supervisory positions. Foremen and field inspectors ordinarily will come from the ranks of those local people who are greatly in need of employment.

Terracing and strip cropping together will account for no more than 12.5 percent of the total, whereas the gully-control work, by employing a large amount of unskilled labor, will absorb more than three-fourths of the total estimated expenditure.

Table 11 presents this same information in a slightly different manner. As will be noted, 79.4 percent of the total expenditure is for personal service—employment for people who are badly in need of work—and only 12.3 and 4.8 percent for supplies and equipment, respectively.

While $15,000,000 appears to be a very formidable sum, when it is distributed over a 5-year period and is to serve as a basis of direct employment to 7,394 people living in 33 counties, it appears well within the limits of reason.

PUBLICITY AND CONTACTS

In developing a program of this nature obviously one of the first and most important steps would be to properly acquaint all landowners of the several counties in which work might be undertaken with the several aspects of the problem. This would involve cooperation with the county agricultural agents, the Smith-Hughes teachers, and all other public-service agencies interested in the betterment of the country.

It is felt that a program of this kind can best be undertaken first by those farmers who show the keenest interest in participating in such activities. Before being allowed to participate the farmer would have the general plan explained to him in detail so that he would have a thorough understanding of his obligations, after which he would be expected to sign a cooperative agreement in which he would be obligated to follow the principles laid down for a period of not less than 5 years.

PHOTOGRAPHS

The photographs taken on the South Carolina Piedmont soil-erosion-control project located on the watershed of the South Tiger River, in Greenville and Spartanburg Counties, indicate more clearly just what are the peculiar problems and how they may be attacked.

Being exceedingly anxious to see labor employed in connection with the relief program of the Federal Government in such a way as to be most useful to this generation and to succeeding generations, I have sought to have this work of soil-erosion control extend to every part of upper Carolina. Accordingly, I requested Dr. T. S. Buie and his staff to prepare for me an estimate of what the cost would be per county for carrying on a most intensive and thorough campaign of soil-erosion control in all the upper part of the State. I now hereby print that suggested outline for the information of the Congress, and I sincerely trust that the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture and the National Administrator of Federal Emergency Relief may cooperate in making a most instructive demonstration of the possibilities of not only usefully employing labor but of conserving that most valuable asset of any nation, to wit, its soil.

SUGGESTED OUTLINE FOR THE EXTENSION OF THE SOIL-EROSION-CONTROL PROGRAM IN THE PIEDMONT SECTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA WITH THE SOIL EROSION SERVICE, THE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION SERVICE, AND THE FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION COOPERATING

Since the watershed demonstrations of soil-erosion control located in Spartanburg, Greenville, and York Counties have advanced to the point where practical control measures have been developed, the following outline of procedure is presented as a method of immediate extension of erosion-control measures throughout the Piedmont in response to urgent demands from farmers for such service. Such an expansion of the work is made possible because of the availability at this time of a considerable number of men who have had some specialized training in erosion-control methods, as well as a limited number of men who have had experience in soil classification and land use while employed with the land-use survey project, and who are at this time without employment.

1. The soil erosion service is to be responsible for all technical training and supervision of technical personnel.

2. The Extension Service, through the local county agent, will be responsible for educational, publicity, and contact work with the individual farmers of the respective counties and will select the farms or areas for demonstration.

3. All costs of county personnel and the necessary supplies and equipment, other than that furnished by the cooperating farmers, will be borne by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. The cost of training and supervision of technical work will be borne by the soil erosion service.

4. The work will be organized on the county-unit basis, employing the following personnel: One experienced local man to be known as the "cooperating agent" and be selected jointly by the soil erosion service, the Extension Service, and the Federal Emergency Relief Administration; four assistants, one to be especially trained in soils, agronomy-farm management, agricultural engineering, and forestry.

These assistants will be selected, subject to the approval of the local Federal Emergency Relief Administration authorities, by the soil erosion service. The training and experience of these men must be such that they are capable of directing the work in their respective fields. As the program develops it may be expanded as the need arises, provided trained personnel is available.

5. The procedure followed will be to select representative farms or fields ranging in size from 10 acres to 100 acres as demonstrations. These selections are to be located in several sections of the county as the county agent and cooperating agent may see fit.

6. On these selected demonstration farms a complete program of erosion control will be put into effect, which will include soil and erosion classification, proper land utilization, diversification of crops, terracing as needed, terrace outlets, controlled waterways, agronomy and forestry plantings, and woodlot management.

7. The cooperating agent, under the direction of the county agent, will keep such records as to cost and accomplishments as may be mutually agreed upon. The results of such demonstrations will be available for use and publication by each of the cooperating agencies.

8. The working plans for each demonstration will be developed by representatives of the soil erosion service and the Extension Service. The soil erosion service and county agent shall have supervision over, and be responsible for, the carrying through of the working plans thus formulated on these demonstration farms.

9. Each county unit will arrange with the local Federal Emergency Relief Administration authorities to use the maximum amount of common labor possible. This will be employed in surveying terrace lines, construction of terrace outlets, preparation of controlled waterways, and in making plantings for erosion control.

10. The cooperating farmer will be required to supply all labor and material required in excess of that made available by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration or other source.

11. The three directing agencies named herein will develop and carry out this program in full cooperation with the State agricultural college, the State experiment station, the State forest commission, and all other conservation and educational agencies interested in the welfare of agriculture.

Estimate of cost, county unit

| | Amount | Percent |

| Grand total per county | 17,560 | 100 |

SOUTH CAROLINA, THE IODINE STATE

The State of South Carolina for several years conducted a food-analysis laboratory under the direction of a most eminent chemist, and his work was checked and rechecked by some of the most distinguished and scientific men of the Nation and of other nations. They have all agreed that the reports of the South Carolina Food Laboratory are correct, and upon that basis a comparison of the mineral content of vegetables and milk produced in upper South Carolina is most instructive. For the information of the Congress I am printing herewith a table showing such comparison, and it is manifest that in the case of iodine, iron, and manganese the South Carolina vegetables contain from 10 to 50 times as much of these most important health-preserving and health-restoring minerals as vegetables produced in other parts of the country.

THE RECORD

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am only interpolating at this time, Mr. Speaker, in view of what has just happened, apropos of the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] to insert some matter in the RECORD. During my entire period of service in this House I have always contended for the liberalization of the RECORD. I have always objected to the policy of some Members of the House considering themselves, perhaps, as the stepchildren of Congress. We are using every effort to curtail our part of the RECORD, while gentlemen in another part of this Capitol insert anything that they please. You gentlemen who have served before know exactly what happens. A Member is refused permission by the House to insert certain matter in the RECORD, and the next day we find it in the RECORD, inserted by some Member of another branch of the Congress. Why should we have this feeling of inferiority? This is only one instance. There are very many other instances where it would appear that we are merely functioning by grace or permission of another branch of the National Legislature. I believe that we are a component part of the legislative system of the Nation and the House should stand more on its dignity and on its rights and on the privileges to which it is justly entitled, and not be subservient to another branch of the Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] has expired.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DEFICITS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I simply want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] the questions that I attempted to ask him while he was speaking. These are the questions: What made these deficits necessary? Was it not the panic of 1929 and the ensuing depression? If so, what party was responsible for the panic of 1929 and the ensuing depression? If these deficits are due to the panic and the depression, then they are due to the action, or failure of action of the Republican Party in permitting the panic and the depression to come. They are Republican deficits and not Democratic deficits, due to the failure of the Republican Party to do its duty to prevent the panic and the depression under which we have been suffering during the past 4 years.

That is what I wanted to bring out. When you are talking about these deficits, claim them. They are your deficits and not the deficits of somebody else. When you talk along party lines, talk it out right, and assume full party responsibility for what happens through the action of your party.

Mr. SHORT rose.

Mr. KELLER. I am glad the gentleman rose. The gentleman asked a question that ought to be answered by somebody who knows, and it just happens, perhaps accidentally, that I do know. The gentleman asked what part of the money that is appropriated for relief is going to the people who need relief. I take great pleasure in saying to the gentleman that a little less than 8 percent of the money appropriated goes for administrative expenses. A little less than 8 percent of the money does not reach the people for whom the money was appropriated. The people on relief, therefore, receive a little more than 92 percent of the gross appropriation—not 50 percent, as he inferred.

Mr. SHORT. We are glad to have the sage of southern Illinois answer the question that I asked.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman is entirely correct in his illusion.

Mr. SHORT. I would answer for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] by saying that the deficits are due primarily to the World War which the Democratic Party kept us out of in 1916. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KELLER. I did not say that. That is a Republican Party alibi. I put my finger on the sore spot, and the gentleman understands it perfectly well.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] has expired.

NEED FOR OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a letter written to the White House by myself on the subject of old-age pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter written by myself to the President of the United States on the subject of Federal old-age pensions. The White House reply was most satisfactory.

The splendid message to Congress a few days ago of the Chief Executive of our Republic firmly establishes the fact that the administration realizes fully the vital need for old-age-pension legislation passing at this session of Congress.

One year ago yesterday I delivered a radio address which was printed in the RECORD for January 8, 1934. Now, 1 year later, I desire earnestly to express the opinion that I am even more strongly in favor of paying our obligation to those poor, old persons who stand in fear of the poorhouse even more than they may fear death itself.

DECEMBER 21, 1934.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is my purpose to state very briefly in this letter my reasons for hoping that the administration will push old-age pensions as well as unemployment insurance in the coming session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

1. The principle of old-age pensions is economically sound. Perhaps one-third of the cost could be borne by the States, thus bringing to them a responsibility which should be theirs in such a program. It would save funds for the counties by removing from relief rolls those persons 65 years of age and over who are unable to care for themselves.

2. It is the politically expedient thing to do. The demagogic demands of extreme and unworkable plans, such as the one being advanced by Dr. Townsend, would be checked.

3. Old-age pensions are in harmony with the spirit of the Golden Rule, and a Federal expenditure of less than forty millions annually would take care of such a program.

To quote from an editorial in the Pittsburgh Press, "It is morally right. For it would include the really forgotten men and women of this rich country, some 500,000 old folks to whom the late afternoon of life now is too often a nightmare."

Faithfully yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

SOCIALISM

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], when making his address, intimated that what the President of the United States is doing is socialistic. I want to say that if the eradication of the slum districts in the United States, if favoring old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, and if making a gigantic effort to give every man in the United States a job who is without work, is socialism, then let us have socialism.

WHAT HAVE YOU TO OFFER IN PLACE OF OUR PROGRAM

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the debate we have just heard the question was asked several times from the Democratic side: What have you to offer in place of the present program? Although this question was repeatedly asked in one form or another, no real opportunity was given, of course, to answer it. Time, if nothing else, precluded an answer. I think the question ought to be answered, and so, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks that I may try to answer the question somewhat at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, asking the question, "What have you to offer in place of our program?" has become a habit with the politically inclined portion of our Democratic brethren.

I am always somewhat amused when I hear this question put by a majority party politician, for invariably he gives me the impression that he has his fingers crossed when he asks it. He always appears to me to be afraid when he asks the question that he might hear a good answer to it. Moreover, I have usually found that when he asks this question he immediately proceeds to do his best to prevent it from being answered. It is perhaps for this reason that our friends seldom inquire simply, "What is your program for recovery?" They always qualify and becloud their question by adding to it some such words as these, "Don't you believe in relief?", or "Don't you believe in public works?", or "Are you in favor of letting women and children starve?", or "Would you stop appropriations for relief when there are 20,000,000 people on relief rolls?"

Gentlemen will recall that each time someone on the other side of the aisle interrupted the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] with this stock question, "What have you got to offer?" the inquiry was accompanied with an interrogatory accusation to the effect that the gentleman from New York was in favor of letting people starve or that he was at least against relief-work appropriations. It required most of that gentleman's time to deny these accusations, and when finally, apparently for the purpose of putting an end to such questions, he explained that he had voted for all of the relief and public-works appropriations, his questioners seemed to take it that he had made a rather damning admission for a Republican.

Now, the fact is that no Republicans are opposed to the expenditure by the Government of such funds as may be necessary to furnish emergency work and relief to those who have lost their jobs and whom private industry cannot employ under present conditions. They are not opposed to public works. The Public Works bill of the last session passed the House with a clear Republican majority. Every relief bill passed with a Republican majority. Do our inquiring Democratic friends ever stop to consider what this means? It means that, although there was a Democratic majority in the House in the Seventy-third Congress of nearly 3 to 1, all of the public works and relief measures, which the Democrats have the habit of claiming as entirely their own and which they now accuse us of opposing, would have become law by Republican votes alone even if there had not been a single Democrat in Congress.

This is true not only of the relief and public-works measures but of the so-called "reform" measures as well. Personally, I voted for all such measures and would do so again.

But because we have always recognized and still recognize the necessity of emergency relief, both direct and indirect, that does not mean that we are wholly satisfied with the majority organization's plan for national recovery. Because we agree with you that it is the province of government to see that people do not starve; it does not mean that we agree with you that the way to permanent recovery lies solely along the path of expenditures either for doles or made work.

The principal difference between the minority and the majority viewpoints, as I see it, is this: Republicans believe that no permanent recovery can be brought about until the 20,000,000 people who have lost their jobs in private industry and are now on relief are again put to work in private industry. We know that under existing conditions private industry by its own unaided efforts cannot reemploy these men, and we believe that legislation will have to be passed to enable and to aid industry to do this. The Democratic House organization, on the other hand, does not believe this; and its plan, therefore, does not contemplate any legislation making it possible for industry to reemploy the unemployed. The majority theory seems to be merely that if an emergency relief program is big enough and is continued long enough the depression somehow or other will die a natural death, and that then private industry of its own volition will resume its normal functions, and that thereby prosperity will return.

The same fundamental difference of opinion exists between the minority and the majority as to plans for permanent farm relief, for the permanent care of the aged, for the proper protection of our workers against injurious and ruinous foreign competition, and for the permanent solution of the several other problems which now vex the country and which will have to be solved, we think, by means other than the mere continuance of and the sole reliance upon an emergency spending program.

Now, in direct answer to the question, What have you to offer? I wish to submit to my Democratic friends the following program, and in doing so I should like them to bear in mind the statement made at the outset of these remarks, namely, that, as emergency legislation, all Republicans recognize and favor the continuance of necessary expenditures for emergency work and relief, and that this program, therefore, is in addition to such necessary emergency legislation. I wish to state also that in submitting this outline I do not contend that it represents the views of every Republican in the House. No single program of any kind could do that, whether it be Republican or Democratic. In principle, however, I believe the majority of Republicans and, without question, all of the liberal Republicans, favor such a program. Certain it is, at any rate, that they would like to have such a program at least considered by the House. And I might add also in passing that Republicans are not alone in this desire, for there are a great many progressive Democrats here. I venture to say that if the majority organization would relax the gag rule it passed on the opening day of this session so that a real affirmative program for permanent recovery could be considered, I am of the opinion that enough liberal-minded Democrats would join the Republicans to pass the greater portion of it.

Here, then, is an outline of the program we should like to have submitted to the Members of this body:

We urge immediate consideration and enactment by the Seventy-fourth Congress of a comprehensive legislative program looking toward permanent economic, industrial, and agricultural recovery and security.

We believe that such permanent recovery and security can be brought about only through the reemployment in private industry of the twenty millions of workers who have lost their jobs and are now on relief, and, through the rehabilitation of the twenty millions of our agricultural population, most of whom are also virtually without purchasing power.

To this end we favor enactment of legislation embracing the following:

First. The spread of employment in private industry by shortening hours of labor to whatever extent may be necessary to reemploy all who are able to do the work required by modern industry.

Second. Federal aid to private industry to enable it to make the necessary change from the old system of long hours and low wages to a new system of shorter hours and higher wages.

Third. Assurance to employers that in operating business and industry with increased employment they will have a fair opportunity of receiving a reasonable return on their legitimately and usefully invested capital, and assurance to employees that they shall receive wages sufficient to give them not only a mere living but a purchasing power wherewith to buy back the products of industry.

Fourth. Unemployment insurance to protect the employee in temporary emergency.

Fifth. An old-age pension sufficient to retire, in decency and comfort, those who have passed the age of their economic usefulness and to remove them from competition with those who have not reached that age.

Sixth. A comprehensive and uniform system of farm-mortgage refinancing at a rate of interest which the farmer can afford to pay and in an amount sufficient to liquidate his existing mortgages.

Seventh. Assurance to the farmer of at least the cost of production plus a reasonable profit on that part of his commodity actually sold and consumed in this country.

Eighth. Adequate tariff protection against all foreign commodities sold in this country in competition with our own, and in cases where tariffs do not afford such protection, then we insist upon resort either to quotas or embargoes or both.

Ninth. Stabilization of the currency through definite legislation enactment and not through decrees issued in the discretion of the Chief Executive.

Tenth. Return of all Federal legislative power to Congress, and resumption by Congress of the duties imposed on it by the Constitution.

Now, I hope none of our friends on the other side will say that this program is too general, or that the majority organization already favors most of it. That seems to be a rather usual majority reply to many constructive minority proposals. Let me anticipate such criticism, however, by saying, first, that specific bills covering most of the points here outlined were introduced in Congress at the last session and that bills covering all of them have been or will be introduced at this session. At another time I hope I may have an opportunity to address myself further to these specific bills. As for the majority party having already approved any part of this proposed legislation, there is, of course, no record of that whatever. The precise contrary is true. By gag rules, by unprecedented parliamentary maneuvers, and through other devious methods by which a majority in this body can prevent consideration of measures, every bill introduced in the Seventy-third Congress looking toward enactment of the permanent program here outlined was killed.

We hope we may be able at this session to secure consideration of at least some of the measures here proposed. We are going to try our best to bring this about. We are going to introduce the bills. We are going to urge your committees, all of which will be composed of 3 Democrats to 1 Republican, to report out the bills. If they refuse, as they did in the Seventy-third Congress, we will try to bring them out by the petition route, which the majority organization, by its opening-day gag rule, has made so difficult. We may succeed and we may not. But whether we succeed or whether we fail, we will at least have given an answer to the question asked here today, What kind of a program have you to offer?

THE LADIES HERMITAGE ASSOCIATION OF NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes and offer a resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the officers and members of the Ladies Hermitage Association assembled in regular meeting on this the 2d day of January 1935:

First. That we acclaim with pleasure and pride the election of the Honorable JOSEPH WELLINGTON BYRNS, the Representative from the Fifth Congressional District of Tennessee, as Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and we tender to him our very cordial congratulations upon his reception of this distinguished honor and responsibility as the reward of a long and illustrious service and the expression of the highest confidence and esteem.

Second. That as Tennesseans we have in especial keeping and care the home of President Andrew Jackson, we rejoice in the bestowal of this honor upon an illustrious Tennessean who is so loyal to the traditions of the Hermitage and to the principles of government and patriotism of Andrew Jackson; and we remember with pride that just 100 years ago that other great statesman and Tennessean, James Knox Polk, a devoted friend of Jackson, assumed the office of Speaker and then for 4 years rendered therein a distinguished service—having immediately succeeded in that office another Tennessean, the Honorable John Bell, whose name is also illustrious in our history.

Third. That as a symbol of our affectionate regard and our patriotic pride, we hereby direct that the officers of the Ladies Hermitage Association procure and present to Mr. BYRNS, in behalf of the association, a gavel made of hickory from the Hermitage, for his use while presiding as Speaker and to be kept by him always in remembrance of its meaning.

Fourth. That we wish for Mr. BYRNS a long and pleasant service in the exalted position to which he is now being called.

Mrs. Rean E. Falk, regent; Mrs. E. W. Graham, vice regent; Mrs. James E. Caldwell, second vice regent; Mrs. Paul De Witt, secretary; Mrs. Lyon Childress, treasurer; Miss Louise Grundy Lindsley; Mrs. Edgar M. Foster; Mrs. Geo. F. Blackie; Mrs. Jesse Overton; Mrs. E. A. Lindsey, and Mrs. Walter Stokes.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received from the Ladies Hermitage Association, of Nashville, Tenn., the resolution which has just been read. With this resolution came a beautiful gift, with the request that I present it to you, our distinguished Speaker. On this gift is inscribed "Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, Speaker, Seventy-fourth Congress, by the Ladies Hermitage Association, January 8, 1935."

This gift is a gavel, a symbol of order, and it was carved from the heart of an old hickory tree grown on the grounds of the Hermitage, the former home of that national hero, Andrew Jackson; and while it typifies the strength, courage, and character of Old Hickory in peace and in war, it also typifies the love, good will, and best wishes the good women of the Hermitage Association bear in their hearts for you.

Every Tennesseean is proud of your success and has watched with increasing interest your upward climb from your boyhood days on the farm to the Speakership of the greatest legislative body in the world. [Applause.] This great honor, the capstone of your long political career, has been won by devoted service to your State and Nation and your square dealings with your fellow man in all walks of life.

One hundred and twenty years ago this day Andrew Jackson, with a strong patriotic army of 6,000 men, conquered the British at New Orleans, which resulted in, we hope, lasting peace between two great nations of the world. May this gavel, which I know will be wielded in fairness, honesty, and good will for all your associates, help you preserve order in your effort to bring to this Nation peace, security, and prosperity.

Appreciating the great honor the Ladies Hermitage Association has conferred on me, it affords me great pleasure to present to you, my long-time friend and associate, this beautiful gavel from your loyal friends and admirers of Tennessee. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. I ask the House to indulge me just a few moments while I express my appreciation to these noble ladies, the members of the board of regents of the Ladies Hermitage Association in my home city, who have expressed themselves in such complimentary terms in the resolution which has been presented through my friend and colleague the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. TURNER. I am grateful to them for this expression of friendship; and you would understand, my friends, just how deep is my gratitude to them if you knew the ladies in question. They are among the most prominent ladies in Tennessee and represent the Ladies Hermitage Association, which has been chartered by the State of Tennessee to preserve the Hermitage, the home of Andrew Jackson, where now repose his remains and those of his faithful and beloved wife. I particularly cherish this gavel, fashioned as it was from hickory which grew around that splendid old home, preserved, as I say, by these ladies, just as it was when Old Hickory left it.

I am immensely pleased also that this gavel should be presented to me upon this day, the anniversary of the great Battle of New Orleans, a battle, my friends, which guaranteed for all time to come the supremacy of our Nation upon the high seas. This day is dedicated in my own State and in the Nation to the memory of Andrew Jackson, that noble Tennessean whom we regard as one of the greatest Americans, one of the greatest soldiers, one of the greatest Presidents, and one of the greatest patriots who has lived in the history of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I would request that the Speaker, in revising his remarks, insert therein a statement of the fact that President Jackson was born in North Carolina.

Mr. McSWAIN. What about South Carolina?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LARRABEE, indefinitely, on account of death in family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, to answer several questions, permit me to say that I shall move to adjourn until tomorrow. On tomorrow the independent offices appropriation bill will be reported. It is expected that all day tomorrow will be devoted to general debate, without any limitation. We contemplate continuing general debate the next day and, if possible, to put some limitation upon the debate, with the hope of finally passing the independent offices appropriation bill on Friday.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 9, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3402) granting a pension to Sarah E. Schott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3403) granting a pension to Louise C. Jones; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3404) granting a pension to Lucy E. Emens; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3405) granting a pension to Lydia E. Perkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3406) granting a pension to Anna L. Rumsey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TERRY: A bill (H. R. 3407) for the relief of Alpha Vint; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3408) for the relief of R. W. Jones; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3409) for the relief of C. C. Young; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

69. By Mr. FISH: Petition of 17 citizens of Middletown, N. Y., favoring a unified system of air defense; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

70. By Mr. ROMJUE: Petition of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, calling attention of proper committees, Members of Congress, and the administrative officials of the Government to the importance of providing adequate support to the United States Bureau of Mines and the United States Geological Survey; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Divine and Universal Light, Lord of life and day, all Thy works shall praise Thy name in earth and sky and sea. In these times of momentous problems, remind us that we are called to be fervent and diligent in all good things. Spirit of God, let our lives work out in righteousness of purpose, in kindliness of disposition toward men, and in most devout reverence toward our Heavenly Father. Do Thou touch our souls with infinite skill, that glorious aspiration may leap from every breast, that goodness and zeal may abound with gentleness and knowledge. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. WOODRUM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 3410) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH reserved all points of order on the bill.

INVESTIGATION OF UTILITIES ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through counsel, for the past 3 years has been making an investigation of all utilities doing business in interstate commerce, especially with reference to holding companies. This report is about ready to be filed. If it does not interfere with any bill that is up for consideration, I should like to review the report on Friday after the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes at that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes on Friday next immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if this report will be available to the Members of the House before that time?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is in the hands of the Printer at this time. Whether or not it will be available by Friday I cannot say. It will depend on how fast the Printer does his work.

The reason I make that statement at this time is that the various groups which have been involved in an investigation of the holding companies—that is, the Power Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—are working on a bill that I hope to introduce in the next few days, but before that is done I should like to call attention to this report, so that when it is available the Members of the House may meet it probably with a better understanding.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the report were made available, it would be easier for the Members to follow the gentleman's line of reason and perhaps ask pertinent questions.

Mr. RAYBURN. The report will be here within a few days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 3410, the independent offices appropriation bill, 1936; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue throughout the day, the time to be controlled and divided between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], the minority member, and myself. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is the intention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and myself to make our respective statements explanatory of the bill as soon as the House convenes tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3410, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield some time?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, during the last campaign the question was very frequently asked, What would the Republicans have done if they had been in power? Of course, it is entirely a speculative question. We were so badly in the minority that any suggestion of legislation was not received with approbation by the majority. Unfortunately, I think, for the country, the same condition exists now as between majority and minority representation. I believe that a strong, virile minority, under our system of government, is beneficial to the country as a whole.

However, this condition does not exist in the Seventy-fourth Congress, so I think that the groundwork ought to be laid now by the minority for suggested legislation on which we can establish a constructive program that can be brought to the attention of the people during the next 2 years.

I am not at all fooled into the belief that suggestions coming from our side of the House will be particularly well received by the majority, irrespective of how meritorious they may be. Nevertheless, I think we owe this duty not only to our constituents but to the country at large to place before the Congress our ideas.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, my work for a good many years past has been confined to taxation and tariff matters. So the suggestions I want to offer are based, naturally, upon what little knowledge I may have acquired over a period of years on these two subjects.

None of the suggestions that I am about to offer is new. They have been before the Congress before, but this makes no difference whatsoever provided they are meritorious.

I will now submit to this House a list of five measures which I have already introduced having to do with the general subject matter of taxation and tariff. They are as follows:

H. R. 1424. Imposing a manufacturers' excise tax.

H. R. 2075. Relating to the taxation of incomes in the so-called "community-property States."

H. J. Res. 66. Providing for a constitutional amendment doing away with the tax-exempt feature of future issues of Federal, State, and municipal bonds.

H. R. 182. Providing for the repeal of the processing tax and the discontinuance of rental and benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

H. R. 3422. Providing for the termination of the President's power to enter into foreign-trade agreements.

I submit for the consideration of Congress and the people the constructive, beneficial character of the five measures to which I have referred. I do this not as a partisan Republican, which I am proud to say I consider myself to be, but, as I think, in the interest of the country, that such legislation as I have referred to shall be given the most careful consideration of the Congress.

PROCESSING TAX

Let me say a few words about H. R. 182, which relates to the repeal of the processing tax, so-called, included in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

When this measure was under consideration in the last Congress I opposed it as bitterly as I knew how, and my opposition, in my judgment, has been justified by the operation of that bill during the time it has been on the statute books. There never was a more iniquitous or unfair tax than the processing tax. There was never a more sectional tax than the processing tax. There never was a tax less beneficial to the Federal Treasury than the processing tax, and there are other objections that I could raise to it.

I shall refer in a moment to the manufacturers' excise tax, and the one objection that was raised in this House when the Ways and Means Committee reported the manufacturers' excise tax in the Seventy-second Congress was the fact that it originally included a tax on food and clothing. We took the bill back to the committee and amended it to provide exemption for food, clothing, medicine, and the necessities of life; yet those are exactly what the processing tax assessed when the Congress adopted the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

You tax every bit of cotton cloth manufactured in this country. You add to the price of every loaf of bread sold to the people of this country. You add tremendously to the cost of living by increasing the cost of the necessities of life that are taxed by the processing tax. And what is done with the money? It does not go into the Federal Treasury. It does not benefit the Federal Treasury. If I am not mistaken, we appropriated $300,000,000 to carry this into effect, and it is of no benefit to anybody but the people who are raising the necessities of life.

Now, I say it is sectional. Let me call attention to the way the proceeds are distributed. It is of no benefit to the Federal Treasury whatsoever. The Government is simply a clearing house, collecting the tax from the consumer and passing it out to the producers. This is all that the law does.

Let me now call attention to some figures; and I shall ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks and to include therein a table of figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me call attention to just a few illustrations of this sectionalism that I speak of. Here are the amounts paid out up to October 31, the latest details I could get:

California paid in processing taxes $16,915,930.38 and received in benefits $2,637,983.01.

Connecticut paid $2,445,132.91 and received $320,561.85.

Illinois, almost $92,000,000, as against $18,537,687.61 of receipts.

Maine paid $2,509,824.26 and received nothing.

New York paid $58,213,425.88, and you received back, my friends, the magnificent sum of $162,894.08.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. If I can secure a little more time I shall be very pleased to yield, and I think I can perhaps get some more time.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman would not tell us what percentage of the total collections were used up in overhead.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Illinois yesterday claimed he knew all about this percentage of overhead, and he had it figured at 8 or 9 percent. I think it is very much higher than that, because I think the gentleman will agree with me that in two different instances we made appropriations to carry on this work, one an appropriation of $200,000,000 and one of $100,000,000.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. It costs the State of New York $300,000 to administer it and it receives $2,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Undoubtedly every State can give the same illustration.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman's table give these figures for each State?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have in addition to the ones I am reading instances where the State has expended little and received ample return. Minnesota expended about thirty-four and one-half million dollars and received back ten and one-half million dollars. Pennsylvania paid $17,000,000 and received back $9,600,000.

Rhode Island paid in $4,224,000 and received back $2,176.

Now, let me read a little on the other side of the picture.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. I should like to ask the gentleman if the figures he has quoted are sums paid by the consumers or are they paid by the manufacturers? It seems to me that there is a great difference whether the taxes are paid by the consumers themselves or whether they are paid by the manufacturers and passed on to the consumers of other States.

Mr. TREADWAY. The latter is the process that the law provides. Take the cotton tax, 4.6 cents per pound. That, I understand, is paid on the processing of the raw cotton processed into ginned cotton. That is why cotton cloth is costing so much more.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman has not answered my question. I wanted to know whether the figures he is quoting were those paid by the manufacturers or those paid by the consumers.

Mr. TREADWAY. Eventually they must be paid by the consumers in other places. I think the best answer to the gentleman's question I can give is that the manufacturer must be the one who pays in the first place, and then it is passed on to the consumer wherever the goods may be used, and these are the amounts paid for processing in these respective States. In many cases, perhaps because of keen competition, the manufacturer must himself absorb the tax. I have even known of firms being put out of business by reason of having to pay this tax. In my own district a small packing concern which had been in business for generations was forced to discontinue operations because it could not pay the processing tax. A Justice of the United States Supreme Court who preferred some of the products of this small concern to those of other establishments was quite disappointed when he ordered a ham and was advised that the company had been forced to close its doors.

The figures I have quoted are official statistics from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and I think that that is the only direct information that we can get.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman did away with the processing tax, would he do anything at all to level the price on the producers of surplus crops who cannot get the advantage of the tariff that some of the other States do get advantage of?

Mr. TREADWAY. I see the drift of the gentleman's inquiry. It is a fair line of inquiry, but to my mind, without having studied the problem, as I know the gentleman from Texas has, this is so sectional and unfair that some other system of equalizing the crop values should be studied and found.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. JONES. To express the thought—and it may not work out so perfectly—that this simply completes the circle and puts all of the sections on the same basis.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that is wrong.

Mr. JONES. One other question. The gentleman realizes that the processing tax is limited by the difference between the parity price for agricultural products and the prevailing price, and if the parity price is ever reached the processing tax automatically goes off.

Mr. TREADWAY. It never will be reached as long as it is as beneficial to certain States as it is.

Mr. JONES. It will be reached if the program is carried.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. It seems to me that the figures which the gentleman has quoted are entirely valueless in proving the amount that the people in the various States pay in processing taxes. The products upon which those taxes are paid may be distributed and sold in many States.

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree to a certain extent with the gentleman, but, nevertheless, it does raise in every State the cost of the necessities of life. That is the point that I maintain, no matter whether it is sold in Massachusetts or in Kansas, and that is my principal objection to the tax.

I should like now to call attention in just a word or two to two or three other States, showing just the reverse of the figures that I have been reading. Arkansas paid in processing taxes $674,000 and received back $16,994,000. Texas paid $14,000,000 and received back $67,000,000. Oklahoma paid $4,894,000 and received back $26,518,000. Those are outstanding illustrations of the unfairness to the citizens of various States in the levying of these processing taxes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sure I shall have to decline to yield further after the gentleman asks a brief question.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does not that indicate that these States that have paid such small processing taxes are not manufacturing States and that they actually pay their whole share?

Mr. TREADWAY. It indicates quite plainly that they are getting paid for their goods in other States from some source.

Mr. BOILEAU. They pay a small amount because they are not manufacturing States.

Mr. TREADWAY. My State should not be obliged to pay for the gentleman's suit of clothes because they are manufactured in another State.

Mr. BOILEAU. If I buy my suit of clothes in Arkansas I pay the tax there.

Mr. TREADWAY. We could get into a very long argument about that. I call attention now to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture on this very subject matter in respect to what has happened by the laying of these processing taxes. Here is an extract from the Secretary's recent report. He said:

> The most serious objection to the processing tax, and one which merits careful consideration, is that the greatest burden falls on the poorer people.

A tax which bears most heavily on the poor is unjustifiable and should at once be stricken from the statute books.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. When you take into consideration the great mass of consumers, the people who are in distress, the processing tax has added from 50 cents to 75 cents on every sack of flour that they buy.

Mr. TREADWAY. And how much on every loaf of bread they buy from the baker? From 1 to 3 cents.

MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX

I now pass to the next measure that I have referred to. I have reintroduced, with very few changes, the so-called "manufacturers' excise tax", which was submitted to Congress in the Seventy-second Congress by the Ways and Means Committee. At the rate of 2¼ percent, with food, clothing, and medicine exempted, that bill would raise $450,000,000. As things are, with the administration spending billions of dollars, $450,000,000 will not go very far toward balancing the Budget. Nevertheless, the manufacturers' excise tax is a fair form of taxation, and one that I commend to the people of the country for careful study.

The bill was not accepted by Congress, and since then many States have adopted a State sales tax. As far as I know of the various State sales taxes, they are all different from the manufacturers' excise tax, which is a wholesale tax, so that in a way they do not conflict. I have added a section to this bill which will give an opportunity for consideration of that point—whether or not the Federal Government should cooperate with the States in allocating a certain sum to States to be used in place of the State sales tax. I am not saying that I advocate it, but I do think it is well worth the consideration of the House.

COMMUNITY-PROPERTY TAX

The third measure which I have introduced was before the Ways and Means Committee last year. It is known as the "community-property tax bill." We had exhaustive hearings on it by a subcommittee, so exhaustive, intentionally so exhaustive, that there was no chance for the measure to be brought onto the floor, even if it could have been passed in the committee, of which, of course, I am not at all certain.

The States of Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Washington have what is called the "community-property system", whereby each spouse is deemed to be the owner of one-half the marital property and income. Thus, if the husband has a salary of $10,000, he makes an income-tax return on $5,000 and his wife on $5,000; and they together pay a total tax of but $260, whereas if the salary had been taxed as a unit, as it is in the 40 States not having the community-property system, the tax would be $415. This represents a saving of 37 percent. Following is a table showing the amount of saving upon incomes of different sizes:

Tax advantages in community-property States

| Net income of husband | Present tax in 40 States (act of 1934) | Present combined tax on husband and wife in community-property States | Tax advantage | Percent of tax saved |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| $5,000 | $80 | $80 | None | 0 |
| $8,000 | 248 | 188 | $60 | 24.2 |
| $10,000 | 415 | 260 | 155 | 37.3 |
| $20,000 | 1,589 | 1,070 | 519 | 32.7 |
| $50,000 | 8,869 | 5,503 | 3,366 | 37.9 |
| $100,000 | 30,594 | 18,513 | 12,081 | 39.5 |

NOTE.—Tax computed on salary of married man with no dependents, with maximum credit for earned income. In community-property States, the husband and wife are deemed to have divided the $2,500 exemption.

If the privilege of allowing separate returns is removed from 8 States, then the whole 48 States will be taxed alike. As it is, 8 States have an advantage over the other 40 States, which means a loss of revenue estimated by the experts to be anywhere from twenty to thirty million dollars a year.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I gladly yield to my friend from California, who is from a community-property tax State.

Mrs. KAHN. I was going to ask why could not the other 40 States, if they so desired, have a similar law?

Mr. TREADWAY. They could. The lady is always correct. I have never known her to be in error. Therefore, the lady is recommending that 40 States follow the example of 8 States. Why should not the 8 States follow the example of the 40 States?

Mrs. KAHN. Because the example of the eight States is such a good one.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not agree with that statement, in spite of its coming from my good friend from California.

One general principle of taxation that we ought to carefully preserve is uniformity and equality. That does not exist where we permit the husband and wife to divide the husband's income for taxation purposes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the gentleman will pardon me for suggesting it, the words "community property" are so confusing and misleading that I wonder if the gentleman would not take about a half minute to explain that?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will do that in my extension of remarks. It is pretty generally known, but I agree with the gentleman it should be made a matter of record, and I will make it a matter of record.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

The next is House Joint Resolution 66, which provides for a constitutional amendment doing away with the tax-exempt feature of all future issues of Federal, State, and municipal bonds. That subject has been before Congress also for quite some time.

A decision of the Supreme Court made many years ago prevents the Federal Government from taxing the instrumentalities of the States and the States from taxing the instrumentalities of the Federal Government. As a result a tremendous abuse of nontaxable securities has grown up, with the outstanding issues aggregating some $50,000,000,000. I do not have the figures showing the amount of revenue lost thereby, and I do not know whether it is possible to estimate it very definitely, but our expert, Mr. Parker, has provided me with some estimates. He states that if all outstanding bonds were made subject to Federal tax, the probable revenue would be in the neighborhood of $180,000,000. However, since only future issues would be taxed under my proposal, the revenue would be small at first but would continue to increase as new bonds were issued and existing obligations were refunded.

However, to my mind the amount of revenue to be derived is of secondary consideration. The major objective is to do away with the present subsidy to wealth, as a result of which the tax base is rapidly being narrowed and the burden of taxation shifted to those least able to bear it.

The amount of tax exemptions that there is today is increasing by leaps and bounds, as new bonds are being issued. Of course, we want to play fair. I have known a time when I thought that financial matters were not handled entirely in a fair and proper manner, particularly with reference to the payment of Government bonds; but that is another subject.

As I have said, the constitutional amendment that I suggest would apply only to future issues, and not past issues. It is a very resourceful form of fair taxation, and there is no reason in the world why one investor should have an opportunity to secure a more favorable type of investment than some other investor not as familiar with stock-market procedure. Nor is there any good reason why the Federal and State Governments should continue to provide a means whereby the wealthy can escape all taxation. So I submit that the sooner we have that constitutional amendment submitted to the States, the better it will be for the Federal Government and for the average taxpayer.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Now, my fifth bill relates to a measure which we discussed at length in the last Congress, and one which I intend to continue to discuss. Perhaps it will be a waste of breath, in a sense, but nevertheless it is a subject that we want to have before the people.

I have submitted a bill calling for the repeal of the so-called "reciprocal-tariff law", which was put through by the "strong arm" last year. Little consideration was given in either branch to that measure. It did away with all control by Congress over the tariff and places this country at the mercy of foreigners in making tariff rates. I am opposed to the principle. I am going to continue to fight that kind of legislation. Therefore I am submitting this bill for its repeal. It should never have gone on the statute books. It is a favorite, I know, of the Secretary of State, whom I admire most highly; but in that particular I differ with him most strenuously. There never should be any star-chamber proceedings whereby any official of another government could sit down and regulate our control over our imports. [Applause.] I am against it. I think every red-blooded American should be. Up to this time the only agreement that has been put through, as far as I know, is with Cuba. It was made behind closed doors, with the Secretary of State from Cuba sitting in to tell us what our rates of tariff should be. I am reliably informed that a number of other agreements are in course of negotiation, particularly with several South American countries, which will permit the importation of additional commodities to supplant those now produced in this country. I am against the law and will continue to raise my voice in this House in opposition to that type of legislation.

I opposed the reciprocal-tariff measure from beginning to end when it was before the House, and I am just as strong in my opposition today. My contention that it provided for an unconstitutional delegation of the taxing power has been strengthened by the decision of the Supreme Court rendered last Monday in connection with section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the so-called "hot oil" decision.

Aside from this technical objection, I believe that any reduction of duties at this time will be a bad thing for the country; that it will close down more factories, increase unemployment, further depress agricultural prices, and in general defeat the whole purpose of the recovery program.

The present arrangement of trying to secure larger foreign markets for certain of our products by allowing increased importations of other products, to the detriment of our own producers and workers, is to me unsound and un-American.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I was interested in the figures which the gentleman was giving as to the amount of taxes received by Southern and Western States in the processing tax. From the figures it would indicate that there is quite a disparity.

Mr. TREADWAY. Quite so.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman admits that for a period of probably 60 years——

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I hope we shall not be obliged to consider it that long. I think the law ought to go off the statute books tomorrow.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman will admit that the processing taxes levied upon their own production——

Mr. TREADWAY. I will admit nothing favorable to the processing tax. The gentleman will get no admission out of me of anything good about the processing tax or the reciprocal tariff either.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield that I may finish my question?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield briefly.

Mr. MAY. In view of the fact that by a high protective tariff system for many years the Southwest has had withdrawn from it all its wealth, does the gentleman object to their getting some of it back by a tax on their own products? [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman likes that kind of a doctrine, he is welcome to it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I have been wondering whether the gentleman's objection has been due largely to the fact that it in part takes away from Congress the right of control or to the probable fact that under the law the tendency will be to bring tariffs down?

Mr. TREADWAY. I never have seen the time when we did not have the machinery to reduce tariffs efficiently when the argument is proven that they should be reduced. The power has been lodged with the Tariff Commission to make recommendations of changes, but the President should not be given the power to negotiate treaties concerning the contents of which Congress has nothing to say.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. In conclusion I want to suggest to my Republican colleagues that they adopt something of the procedure that I have undertaken here in the introduction of these five measures. In their particular line of duty or in their committee work the Members who see defects in recent legislation could be of assistance by offering suggestions, introducing bills, and making speeches on them during the next few months, so that when the Seventy-fourth Congress is drawing to a close and the next campaign is under way we would at least have a program of endeavor which we could present to the voters of the country for their approbation and the return to power of the Republican Party. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The table showing collections and disbursements under the processing-tax law follows:

Processing-tax collections and rental and benefit payments to Oct. 31, 1934

| State | Collections | Payments | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | Rentals and benefits | Removal of surplus |
| Alabama | $10,552,719.63 | $15,481,957.06 | |
| Arizona | 441,226.56 | 650,309.78 | |
| Arkansas | 674,623.02 | 16,994,112.91 | |
| California | 16,915,930.38 | 2,637,983.01 | $3,865,143.93 |

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, at a later time I expect to go more fully into certain phases of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but his speech and his statements are so full of holes and so false in their premises from my viewpoint and, I think, from the national viewpoint that I cannot refrain from saying a few words at the present time.

The gentleman decries sectionalism, yet almost in the same sentence he defends sectionalism. Nobody who has studied the question one moment believes that a protective tariff can be of any appreciable benefit to commodities like cotton and wheat and other commodities which are produced for the world market, yet the people who grow these commodities must pay the increased price on the tariff-protected articles.

I have always said that whatever policy is established should be a national policy. We should have a tariff for all or a tariff for none. [Applause.] The only purpose of the processing fees is to complete the circle, making the tariff, as nearly as possible, national in character. The gentleman tries to make that sectionalism because, forsooth, certain States which for 60 years have been paying tribute to his State are getting more of the proceeds from the processing fees while his State is getting more of the proceeds from the protective tariff. [Applause.] That just balances it. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If his argument were true, then because New England and perhaps New York loan more money and therefore receive more in total interest rates than the southern and western sections of the country, we should abolish interest because it is sectional.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do not include New York with Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw the names of particular places. I was using them merely as illustrations for the purpose of showing the faulty logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will yield further, he will remember, I am sure, that we supported the processing tax and were happy to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly. He is always broad-gaged. I thank him and the many others like him who have stood for a broad general policy. I was simply presenting an illustration, that is all; but here is the proposition: Whatever is necessary to complete the circle and to put every American citizen on the same dead level of equality with every other American citizen, I am for; are not you?

Now, I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts what he would do to put the surplus-producing farmer on the same level with the others, and he said, "Oh, some system ought to be worked out." But in the many years his party has been in power they have not worked out a system; and we have. [Applause.] Unless he offers a better one let us keep the one we have. If he does not want his manufacturers to pay a processing fee, let them pay a proper price for their raw materials and automatically the processing fee goes off. Most of them are willing to do this but cannot unless their competitors do. This enables them all to be on the same level in this regard. It is merely a way of getting a proper price for the farmers' products. Surely the gentleman does not want to grind down the farmers' price below a living level. The gentleman represents a great manufacturing State. We glory in its accomplishments. I am sure that in their heart of hearts they will recognize the innate fairness of a just price to all Americans.

We have nothing against the manufacturers. They must operate if we are to prosper. On the other hand, the producer must live if the factory is to continue to spin. The South and West are integral parts of the American Union, and so is the East. If Massachusetts pays a larger percentage of the processing fees, it is because she is fortunate enough to have more factories. Surely they would not be selfish enough to claim the advantages of the tariff without according the producer a similar restoration through the proceeds of the processing fees. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I am afraid my friend from Texas in his enthusiasm has wandered into a misstatement of facts. He made the statement that the party of the gentleman from Massachusetts had never constructed a system, if I understood him right. They did have a system, but it was particularly beneficial to one section of the country instead of being beneficial to all.

Mr. JONES. I mean other than a sectional system; I mean that they had not formulated a national system. I thank the gentleman for his correction. One of the things that has been wrong with this country is that there have been certain sectional policies which benefited only a few and which drained the lifeblood from the veins of large sections of the country and caused paralysis to come on in the business and economic structure. We cannot have a balanced country any more than we can have a balanced body if the blood flows just one way. In a great many instances in this country the blood has been flowing one way only, and it has caused paralysis in certain sections, with ultimate injury to all. I hope the gentleman will lift up his eyes and see beyond the fog. We want to be fair to him, and I am sure he wants to be fair to us. Let us have a truly national policy. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States is one of the biggest business institutions in the whole world. In order to handle the affairs of this Government it is necessary for the Chief Executive to have helpers. He has to have expensive heads of all the numerous bureaus that have grown up during the wasteful system that has been in vogue for so many years. He has to have ones in authority for all of the independent offices. He has to have heads of his 10 departments; and with all this horde of helpers it is but natural that the President of the United States, whether Democrat or Republican, must once in a while get those in places of power and authority whose actions none of us may approve. Like any other class, there are some off-colored ones; there are some who do not measure up to standard, who are inefficient and incompetent.

When any officials are not doing their duty, the President welcomes information about it. When there is any housecleaning to do in his administration, he wants to do it himself. The responsibility rests upon us Democrats. If criticism is in order, we Democrats want to do it. We do not want any meddling Republicans criticizing any part of our Democratic administration.

May I say that while I back my President and while I back his administration in all endeavors to carry out his constructive policies in an attempt to bring this Government back to normalcy, whenever I find that there is waste or incompetency or inefficiency in any bureau or any department, I feel it my duty as a member of the Democratic Party and of the new-deal administration to call it to the attention of the Chief Executive. [Applause.]

I am today calling the attention of the President in the White House to the fact that we have one bureau Congress created which makes no attempt to carry out the purpose and intent of Congress when it was created, but in order to try to avoid its responsibility to the Members of Congress it foolishly contends that it is a corporation and is not responsible in any way to the will of the Congress.

Regardless of its ridiculous contention, it is a quasi-Government institution. It had $2,000,000,000 of its bonds underwritten by this Government. There is in this bill an item appropriating for its office, for its board, for the salaries of its personnel, the sum of $264,000. When it asks for and accepts $264,000 from this Government to pay the salary of its personnel and its expenses and it has $2,000,000,000 of its bonds guaranteed by this Government, it cannot come in here with the excuse that it is a corporation and not subject to the control of the Membership of this Congress. All of you know what board I am referring to. I am referring to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

I pick out that Board as exemplifying the quintessence of arrogancy, of inefficiency, of incompetency, and of direct failure and refusal to carry out the will and purpose of this Congress. This creature has become greater than its creator. It talks about being a corporation and not responsible to Congress. Why, it has received its life and existence from the Congress, and it is responsible to this Congress and to the people of this country, for it has been given authority to use $2,000,000,000 of bonds that are underwritten by the taxpayers of this Nation and for which the United States Government is responsible.

I do not believe that there is a Member of this House who will defend it, unless it is some Member who has just been elected and has not been in office long enough to know just how it has misused its authority, and has ignored and denied the people all over the United States of their rights, and caused thousands of worthy home owners to lose their homes.

They are responsible for inexcusable and untold suffering in every State of this Union, and for allowing thousands of needed homes to be foreclosed and taken from worthy home owners.

They have made loans to bankrupts, big loans, $5,000, $6,000, $7,000, $8,000, $9,000, and $10,000, when not one payment back on some of them will ever be made, and have denied little loans of $1,000, $1,500, and $2,000 to worthy citizens, good men and good women, when their property was ample security, because, forsooth, they could not get a gilt-edge Dun & Bradstreet report, and could not find any financiers to sign with them and underwrite them. They have without hesitation promptly closed loans for friendly banking institutions who wanted their frozen assets cashed, but the poor widow living in California, living in Texas, or living in Virginia, or up in Michigan, is denied all relief, because the first thing they do is to get a Dun & Bradstreet report on the washerwoman. [Laughter.]

This woman will probably want a little loan of $1,200 to save the roof over the heads of herself and little children, upon which home she has been paying for years and has reduced the mortgage until it is good security. Yet they hold up her loan and they write back to her, telling her, "You must get two financiers to underwrite you and to sign your notes with you before we can make a loan."

They have held up loans in their legal department on the most frivolous matter that they could dream of after some of the best lawyers in the State have passed the titles. For instance, after one of the most distinguished lawyers of my State had passed the title for them as their lawyer they wrote back and told him that he had made a great mistake; that before they could close the loan he would have to get a quitclaim deed from the wife of a man through whose name the title had passed some 25 years previously. This lawyer wrote back and told them if they would examine the abstract carefully they would find out at that time the man was single and did not marry until some 15 years after he had deeded the property.

They have refused to make loans on the most inconsistent excuses imaginable. For instance, there was one small loan of a few thousand dollars that was denied because, forsooth, the man was getting a salary of $150 a month. They wrote back that any man who received a salary of $150 a month did not need a loan from them.

I remember another case where a traveling man was getting $225 a month salary, but he had to maintain himself. His affidavit showed that he had to wear the very best of clothes in order to be presentable when he went in to sell the goods of his employer, and it took every dollar of his salary to maintain his family. That application was turned down, because they said any man who got $225 a month was not entitled to a loan from them. Then they would turn down others because their salary was only $150, which income they did not deem sufficient.

I wish every Member of this House would go down there to their office here in Washington, and make them show you all of the different ridiculous forms which they make an applicant sign, all of the different questionnaires that the applicant must sign, that the holder of his mortgage must sign, that the county appraiser must sign, that their preliminary appraiser must sign, that their private appraiser must sign, and their Dun & Bradstreet reporter must furnish. Have them show you all of their forms they require. It is the most ridiculous, unbusinesslike, and outrageous procedure I have ever witnessed for any so-called "business institution" in this land to pursue.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I am very much interested in the gentleman's remarks and I would like to ask him a question. I believe the gentleman from Texas is a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House. I would like to know how he feels, in view of the activities of this bureau, with reference to the sum of $4,000,000,000 for public works without earmarking any of it as to how it is going to be spent?

Mr. BLANTON. When we reach that Public Works matter I shall have some remarks to make. I am speaking now of this one particular bureau, and I want to use my time in trying to get these facts to the President of the United States. I think he ought to remove every one of them from the top to the bottom. [Applause.] I have always been against big lump-sum appropriations. I believe in specific appropriations. The only way we can have the will of Congress respected by bureau officials is to properly earmark every big sum that we appropriate.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In my State there has been a great deal of criticism in reference to the delay in making these loans. Will the gentleman tell us how that works out in Texas? How long does one have to wait before a loan can be gotten through?

Mr. BLANTON. There have been good loans in my State that went to the legal department as far back as May of last year and they have been held up, up, and up. Then on December 15 they had the audacity to write every one of their representatives in my State that "we will make no further loans." They gave as their excuse, "Our money has been exhausted."

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BACON. I understand there is enough money in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to take care of all of the applications which have reached the legal division.

Mr. BLANTON. Their claim is that there is enough left to complete the loans on applications that have been approved and are now in their legal department, but by that I have been given to understand that they mean applications that are awaiting some little objection to title being cleared up, for I know of applications that were submitted to their county attorney and he submitted his opinion that the abstract showed good title, yet have been held up for months and months on account of one little excuse and another, and the home owner has been informed that his loan cannot be closed because their money is exhausted. They notified every appraiser and every county attorney in my district that after December 15, 1934, they would accept no more applications.

Mr. BACON. There are 350,000 applications that have not reached the legal division.

Mr. BLANTON. And they were filed many months ago.

Mr. BACON. Yes; some of them filed in 1933. Can the gentleman suggest what we are going to do to take care of these 350,000 applications that have not yet reached the legal division?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you what I would do if I had my way. I would eliminate from this bill every single word of the provision that appropriates $264,000 for their salaries, and I would leave them suspended in the air without an infernal cent until they find out and admit that this Congress has control over them—an institution for which Congress has bound the people and the taxpayers to the extent of $2,000,000,000 in bonds.

Mr. O'CONNOR and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield first to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think there is some confusion. The gentleman from New York just referred to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and, as I understand the gentleman from Texas, the gentleman is not talking about that organization.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about both of them, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, because John H. Fahey, T. D. Webb, William F. Stevenson, Fred W. Catlett, and H. E. Hoagland run both of them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thought the gentleman was talking about the Federal home-loan bank.

Mr. BLANTON. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board is the head of the whole institution.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman received most of his applause on the minority side, but as I recall that was a creature of the administration of Mr. Hoover, and we had nothing to do with the establishment of that Board.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. I want that Board to understand that neither the Democrats on my side of the aisle nor the Republicans on the other side are approving anything they are doing down there. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to express my very great pleasure in that the gentleman is getting into his stride and relieving the Republicans of a lot of trouble, but I want to make this suggestion——

Mr. BLANTON. I yield not for a speech, but a question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will ask the gentleman this question: Does not the gentleman think there was a great deal of justification for the flimsy excuses offered recently by the Home Loan Board for not making these mortgages because it was unwise to tell the people that they were running out of money until after election, when they could tell them? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the unfortunate thing about our good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Cotuit, is that he is always thinking of politics. [Laughter.] He is never thinking about questions in which the people are interested. The people are tired of politics. They want constructive matters considered. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PIERCE and Mr. KNUTSON rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to both of my colleagues in a moment.

I have one case in mind where a woman had a splendid home. She used to be in affluent circumstances. This residence was built on some of the finest residential lots in my home city. She paid $17,000 in cash, besides using materials that were on the ground, in building this modern brick residence. She had a substantial garage with servants' quarters. The place was splendidly landscaped with plants and trees and flowers. She wanted a loan of less than $7,000 on it to prevent it from being foreclosed. She also had a farm out in the country that brought her in some revenue. They wrote her and told her she would have to be underwritten by at least two men of financial standing.

I had her write back and offer her two sons. One of them was a stockholder in one of the best-paying little corporations in my State, the Abilene Daily Reporter-News. Besides his stock he owned in it, for 17 years he had been getting a salary of $250 a month. He was a single man. She had another son who was manager for the West Texas Utilities Co., getting $175 a month. She offered these two sons to sign with and underwrite her, and the Dallas office wrote back and told her they had a private report that the boys were just barely making enough to live on and they could not close the loan. I told them it was because they had turned down their county appraiser and were sending some unimportant, uninformed representative out from Dallas, 200 miles away; and when they investigated it, they found I was correct, and, after more than a year's delay, finally made the loan.

This leads me to call your attention to another situation. The appraiser in that county is one of the best-informed men in my State. His father years ago represented my district in this House when it was composed of 80 counties in Texas. This man's uncle was Hon. Francis Cockrell, a former United States Senator from Missouri; and there is not a finer man or a man of greater business experience and ability in my home State than Fred Cockrell. He knew every citizen in the county. He knew every piece of property in his home city. He knew the history of the people and of the property. He had lived there for 40 years. He was the appraiser there for Taylor County; and on June 4, 1934, without ever seeing him or knowing anything derogatory about him, and without notice to him, this office shunted him aside and appointed another in his place. I sent them a statement and a request from the newspapermen of my home city, from the mayor and certain city and county officials, from many of the merchants, from the banks, from the chamber of commerce, and leading business men of my city, certifying to his competency and worthiness and requesting that they not boycott this appraiser but allow him to have his appraisal and do him justice. They appointed, yet for 6 months they did not send Judge Cockrell a single appraisal, and when I wrote Jim Shaw, the manager at Dallas, about it, here is the answer I got:

The Washington office insisted upon another appraiser for Taylor County, and Mr. J. L. McDavid was approved.

And when I made them answer specific questions they admitted:

We have sent 155 requests for appraisal to Mr. J. L. McDavid since June 4, 1934.

We did not send any requests for appraisals to Mr. Fred Cockrell in August 1934. We did not send any requests for appraisal to Mr. Cockrell in September 1934. We have not sent any requests for appraisal to Mr. Cockrell so far during the month of October 1934.

You are advised that Mr. Cockrell has never been discharged.

We have never notified Mr. Fred Cockrell that he has been discharged simply because he has not been discharged. However, I will say frankly, as stated above, he has not been given any appraisal.

Mr. Cockrell does not get any pay unless he is given an appraisal. During all these months he has waited for the appraisals ready to appraise them. He received nothing because they did not send him any. He was unjustly boycotted. Then Manager Shaw further says:

I saw no reason why we should notify Mr. Cockrell that Mr. McDavid had been approved by the Board at Washington as the appraiser for Taylor County.

Also, he said:

Inasmuch as we had been instructed by the regional appraiser to get another man, I saw no reason why we should notify you in regard to the matter.

They do not have to notify Members of Congress that appraisers appointed by them have been boycotted. Every other appraiser in my district, then consisting of 19 counties, I selected. I selected the 19 county appraisers and the 19 county attorneys for my 19 counties, and all of the balance of them had given entire satisfaction, and no complaint was made about any of them except Judge Cockrell.

They made no objection against any of the other 18 appraisers and none against any of my 19 county attorneys. They were all satisfactory.

They did not want Mr. Cockrell, because they said he was too old, yet one of my other appraisers was several years his senior. I wrote back that they had a member on their Board here in Washington who must be too old, because one member of their Board is 71 years old, and I said that if they wanted to take Mr. Cockrell off on account of his age they ought to take the member of the Board off first.

There was a birthday party held the other day here at the other end of the Capitol by Senators, and all three of them were over 70 years of age. One of them, the most active man in this Capitol, one who knows more about the business of this Government than almost any other, and one of our ablest statesmen, a distinguished Senator from Virginia, celebrated his seventy-eighth birthday at that party in the other end of the Capitol.

Now, I want to read another thing, because you ought to know how the arrogant chairman of this Board violates the understanding we have all had concerning appointments. I have talked with over a hundred of you colleagues and I find that he has treated all of you just as he has treated me, and has tried to ignore our rights.

I wrote him and told him the administration had allowed us to appoint these appraisers, and we have appointed them, and Judge Cockrell had served for months and I wanted to know whether he was going to abide by it and resume sending appraisals to Judge Cockrell.

He wrote back:

Let me say first that our Board never extended to Democratic or any other Congressman the right to name county appraisers in the counties in their district. No such proposal was ever brought to the attention of the Board so far as I am able to learn, and no authority was ever given by the Board to anyone to make such a commitment.

Every county appraiser in my 19 counties was selected by me. Every county attorney in my 19 counties was selected by me.

Mr. COX. And he knows it is untrue?

Mr. BLANTON. He knows it is untrue. He has ignored us and avoided his responsibility, and I hope our good President will remove him and all of his Board, and Manager Shaw in Dallas, for they have no business drawing salaries. Here is the agreement signed by every member of the Texas delegation, and by both of our United States Senators, and that was approved by Hon. James A. Farley, the chairman of our Democratic National Committee:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1933.

Hon. JAMES A. FARLEY,
Chairman National Democratic Executive Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FARLEY: The Texas delegation in Congress has unanimously agreed upon the following:

The two Senators are to control the following patronage: District and appellate judges, district attorneys, United States marshals, internal-revenue collectors, custom officers, postmasters in their respective home cities, all State-wide appointments, and all appointments requiring confirmation of Senate.

The Congressman in each district is to control, subject to above, all postmasters in his district, all appointees in his district to be made by Mr. Morgenthau, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Census Bureau, the Agricultural Department, the Treasury Department, and other appointments in his district not State-wide.

Until a successor for the Briggs district has qualified, appointments in that district, not controlled by Senators, are to be jointly controlled by the present three Congressmen-at-large.

Until January 1, 1935, the present Representatives of districts shall control in the counties of their present existing districts, and the redistricting is not to be recognized until January 1, 1935. We ask that this agreement be respected by all departments and offices.

Morris Sheppard, senior Senator; Tom Connally, junior Senator; Martin Dies, Thomas L. Blanton, Fritz G. Lanham, W. D. McFarlane, O. H. Cross, Jos. W. Bailey, Jr., Sterling P. Strong, Luther A. Johnson, Hatton W. Sumners, Marvin Jones, Ewing Thomason, R. M. Kleberg, Milton H. West, Joe H. Eagle, J. J. Mansfield, Wright Patman, Morgan G. Sanders, Geo. B. Terrell, J. P. Buchanan, Sam Rayburn, Texas delegation in Congress.

The above agreement was first arranged by the Members of the House, who requested the Senators to join them.

Gentlemen, if you colleagues want to make this arrogant Board find out there is a Congress here operating and that Members of the House of Representatives have certain rights, and that Congress created their Board and gave them $2,000,000,000 of the people's bonds to spend, take this salary item of $264,000 out of this bill and cut their money off, and you will have them climbing up here on their hands and knees to you. They will then find out that you are here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to make them know that I am here, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], in discussing the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, has raised a very serious question of future policy: As I stated in the question that I asked him, there are over 350,000 American citizens, men and women, who have made applications for home owners' loans whose applications have not yet reached the legal division. As I understand it, there is sufficient money in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to take care of the applications that have already reached that division. I submit, however, that if we stop there, we are discriminating in favor of some American citizens against others, relieving some distressed cases and ignoring others, under an arbitrary hit-and-miss rule that certainly does not appeal to my sense of fairness. I should like to see the Home Owners' Loan Corporation continued, so that the application of every American citizen eligible under the act may have serious consideration given it. This policy of consideration should be extended at least to every case in the files of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation on the date of its shut-down order, or on November 15, 1934. It has not been the fault of many of these distressed home owners, now facing foreclosures on their homes, that their applications have not reached the legal division. Many of those applications that have not reached the legal division have been in process since the fall of 1933. There have been, no doubt, avoidable and unavoidable delays up and down the line. It would be extremely unfair to wind up the Home Owners' Loan Corporation by simply considering only those cases where the applicants for relief have been fortunate enough to have their applications reach the legal division.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the policy of the administration may be as to the future. Personally, I believe that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, if it is sound and if it has been well administered, should be continued. If it is not sound, if it has not been well administered, and it is the proposal of the administration to discontinue it, then there should be some congressional investigation of what has gone on.

I emphasize the fact that these more than 350,000 citizens whose applications have been filed for many months will receive no consideration whatsoever unless this Congress makes some provision to have their applications considered to a final conclusion on their merits.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is any provision being made at the present time for the thing the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. BACON. The continuance of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will require an authorization act, which will have to come from the Banking and Currency Committee. The Appropriations Committee has no authority in the matter.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not true that many of these applicants have gone to considerable expense in filing their applications?

Mr. BACON. There is no question about that, and they are now being left high in the air.

Mr. BOLTON. Has the gentleman any information as to the percentage of loans which have been granted out of those applied for?

Mr. BACON. I particularly checked up the percentage of loans granted as against applications in two States, New York and Ohio. These were chosen because they represented States where the applications were the heaviest. I have gone over the entire list, and the results vary widely. In New York, for instance, the number of net applications on December 6 totaled 120,605, of which 56,310 were finally closed, and 15,237 in the legal division. This left 49,058 applications in various stages of consideration, many of them no doubt nearly ready for submission to the legal division, in an absolutely suspended status. In other words, out of the total number of net applications in New York, 41 percent were left in the suspended status, to be thrown out entirely if the business of the Corporation is to be wound up. And this quite irrespective of the progress of the application in each individual case.

In Ohio there were 170,034 net applications, of which 59,510 were finally closed and 43,125 were in the legal division on the date of the Corporation's closing order. This left 67,399 applications remaining, which were placed in a suspended status. The percentage in Ohio of so-called "closed and legal-division applications" of the entire number of net applications runs about the same as in New York, nearly 59 percent.

The percentages of closed and legal-division cases in other States runs very low in some cases; in others, extraordinarily low.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman agree with me that we ought to authorize up to $2,000,000,000 to carry on this work and take care of the other applicants in this country?

Mr. BACON. As I say, it is not a question of appropriation; it is a question of authorizing the further issuance of bonds; and that is a matter which will have to come from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Committee on Appropriations has no authority in the matter.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. It ought to be stated in that connection that the funds for the appropriation of the Home Loan Bank Board and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are collected from the applicants and are covered into the General Treasury and merely have to be reappropriated.

Mr. BACON. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is a self-sustaining organization.

Mr. BACON. I am not at this time criticizing the administration of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I am raising the question of future policy. If it is sound, it ought to be continued. If it is being stopped because it is not sound, or because it has not been well administered, then Congress should investigate.

Mr. WOODRUM. I quite agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak today, but I rise to point out that not all of the Members on this side of the House are in accord with the position of my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], on the question of the processing tax. In the first place, the figures which were cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts as showing the States which pay the tax are absolutely valueless for that purpose, because those figures are taken from the Bureau of Internal Revenue and simply show the taxes which are collected in the various States. Those taxes, while paid in the first instance by the manufacturer, are paid in the end by the consumers of the product, and the only way that you can get any accurate figures as to the amount of processing tax that the people of any State pay would be to find out the consumption of the particular product in the State and multiply it by the amount of processing tax.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Would not the amounts paid in the different States be in the same proportion as population? In other words, do not the people of the different States tend to eat approximately the same amount of bread per capita, do they not eat approximately the same amount of pork, and do they not wear approximately the same amount of cotton cloth, and would the total amount of processing tax paid in the United States on any commodity divided by the population of the country and multiplied by the population of various States give approximately the States' respective contributions?

Mr. HOPE. I think that certainly would be approximately correct. Furthermore, I cannot see that the fact some States receive a larger portion of the tax than others is in itself an argument against the fairness of the tax. The agricultural States which receive the greater proportion of these payments cannot from the very fact that they are largely agricultural receive the benefits which other legislation has given industrial States.

Now I believe that the processing tax is based on pretty good Republican doctrine. I am a believer in the protective-tariff system, and a processing tax, after all, is only a complement to the tariff, because it affords protection on those products which are on an exportable basis and which cannot be protected by a tariff on imports. There is no reason that I can see why any Republican who believes in the tariff system and believes in protecting the industries of this country in that way should not be willing to protect the great industry of agriculture, which cannot be fully protected by a tariff in the case of crops where we have an exportable surplus.

I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that the first processing tax bill which passed either House of Congress was a Republican bill, namely, the Norbeck bill, which passed the Senate at a time when the Republicans were in control of that body.

Now it is true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] says, that a processing tax does not bring any revenue to the Government. Neither does a tariff, which is effective in protecting domestic industry, bring any appreciable revenue if the rate is high enough to protect the industry in question. If we levied a tariff for revenue only, in practically all cases it would be much lower than one for protection.

Now, the amount that the average individual pays out in the way of processing tax is comparatively inconsequential. The tax on wheat, for instance, when translated into the amount which the consumer of a loaf of bread pays, amounts to about one-half cent per loaf. You can figure it out for yourselves. A bushel of wheat, upon which a processing tax of 30 cents is paid, will make 60 loaves of bread. The cost is one-half cent per loaf, as far as the tax is concerned, and if the price of bread has risen to any greater extent it is because of the effect of the N. R. A. codes and other increased costs.

Not only is that true, but in some cases a part of the processing tax is paid by the farmers themselves. I think it is generally conceded that in the case of the tax on hogs at least a part of it is being paid by the farmers. To that extent it is not being paid by the consumer. So that the man who is getting the money in that case is actually, I am afraid, paying a part of it out of his own pocket.

Furthermore, the consumers of this country have this protection as far as the processing tax is concerned, in that under the provisions of the law itself the tax can never be higher than an amount necessary to equal the parity price for the product in question. By "parity price", of course, is meant a price which assures to the farmer the same buying power for his dollar that everyone else has. In other words, that the farmer can sell his goods for a price which will enable him to buy on the same basis that he sells.

Under the provisions of the law itself the tax can never be higher than the amount necessary to raise the price to parity. As a matter of fact, it has not been enough, in practically all cases, to bring a parity price. The price that the consumer is paying today is less than he would pay if agriculture was getting a parity price for its products.

In conclusion let me submit this: I do not believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], or any gentleman on this floor, would begrudge the farmer a fair price or a parity price for his products. It does not make any difference to the consumer how that parity price is paid. If the consumer is going to pay the farmer the price that he ought to receive for his products, what difference does it make whether he pays part of it in the form of a processing tax and part of it in the initial price that he pays the producer, or whether he pays it all when he buys the product? In other words, what difference is there in paying a dollar a bushel for wheat when you buy it from the farmer or paying the farmer 70 cents and paying a 30-cent processing tax?

I do not want to take up any more time this afternoon. Some time later I hope to discuss this subject at greater length, but I do submit that there is no reason why any Republican should object, in theory at least, to the payment of a processing tax on agricultural products, at least where that tax is not larger than an amount necessary to bring a parity price. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] with reference to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I am not familiar with the operation of that organization in the State of Texas, but I am familiar with it in the State of New Mexico. I consider it one of the finest organizations, one of the finest agencies we have in the State of New Mexico. People have received courteous treatment there. Their requests are granted as quickly as possible, consistent with the merits of the request. Some time before election they ran out of money and the applicants were told frankly at that time that the organization was without funds. We did not wait until after the election. We told them before. I had nothing whatever to do with the selection of personnel.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that a very small percent of the meritorious applications for home loans in his State have been granted and the loans made?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know the percent that have been granted, but I do know that we have received no complaint until such time as the funds were exhausted.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman was elected only last November.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; last November.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not represented his constituents in Congress during all of 1934 and most of 1933.

Mr. DEMPSEY. During 1934 I was N. R. A. State director for the State of New Mexico, and I was director of the National Emergency Council for the State of New Mexico.

Mr. BLANTON. Appointed by whom?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Appointed by the President to represent the N. R. A. and appointed by the National Emergency Council to represent it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not yet had time to hear from all of those widows and others in New Mexico who have not been granted loans.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not receive communications from all the widows in the State of New Mexico, only some; but I may say to the gentleman from Texas that those from whom I have received communications have no complaint in this regard except the lack of funds.

In fairness to the organization, I do want to state that we have an efficient organization administering the funds of this Corporation in our State, and I wish to see it continued. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I wish to thank our distinguished colleague from Texas for the magnificent statement he has just made concerning the home owners' loan situation. There is not a Member on either side of this House who has been in office during the last 2 years but who knows that the most harrowing experience that comes to a Representative is the pleas and letters from home owners in danger of being set out on the street, and the official delays, the bureaucratic difficulties, and the uncertainties surrounding their cases. I am delighted to think that our friend from Texas has taken it upon himself to clear up the matter. While he is at it and doing such a fine job in the matter of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, I wish he would continue his efforts throughout the entire new deal and make it workable.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I am sorry, but I am afraid I shall have to get along without the gems of wisdom that fall from the lips of the gentleman from California.

I venture at this time to make a few observations upon the message delivered by the President of the United States in this House on January 4. I look upon this message in the nature of a speech from the throne, and I am sorry that it has not had the opportunity of being fully discussed on the floor of the House as it deserves to be. I may say in passing that I have supported the program of the President of the United States in every way within my power as a member of the Republican opposition; and as he proceeds in his great task I propose to do everything I can to assist him and do as little as I can to obstruct him when I think his proposals are sound and workable; but in his presentation of this particular message I feel that it is my duty as a Member of this House to call attention to certain statements contained therein.

To begin with, I look upon this message as one of the cleverest pieces of political propaganda that we have heard in a long while. It reveals a rare mastery of mob psychology. It contains a message to the left, wrapped in the uncertainties and generalities that are so appealing to that type of mind. It makes an appeal to the right, very sincere, very clear, and very concise; and then it appeals to those in between. As a piece of political propaganda, it leaves out no group susceptible of partisan influence. It makes me think of a doggerel I used to hear when a youth up in Massachusetts concerning the ingredients of a New York cocktail:

A little whisky to make it strong,
A little water to make it weak,
A little lemon to make it sour,
A little sugar to make it sweet.

[Laughter.]

I shall now call attention to a few of the President's statements in his message, and do so not in the spirit of criticism, but for the purpose of clarification:

We have undertaken a new era of things.

That is his first statement. I want to know who "we" is; and I want to know the nature of this "new order of things." If the statement is for the purpose of announcing that the United States Government is going to create a new social order, I say that history has rendered a verdict that this is impossible. No government in the history of the world has ever created a new social order. A social order grows out of the vast and unplumbed individual and social complex of all the people. Let me illustrate: The Anglo-Saxons came across from the swamps of Germany and settled in the little island that is now England. They had a certain spiritual concept of freedom. They were conquered by the Danes; they were conquered by the Normans; yet through all the vicissitudes of 2,000 years it has been impossible for any government, for any conquering power, for any vicissitude of time and chance to change the essential characteristics and social genius of that people.

America started as the expression of a great spiritual concept. It is characteristics of the South, characteristics of the North, characteristics of every intelligent American in this land that determines the broad outlines upon which we will have to develop in all the progress we may make through the ages. We may travel by oxcart, we may travel by automobile, but, whatever the conveyance, we will move forward upon the spiritual and fundamental principles that are now and have always been characteristic of the American society and the American people. So when the President of the United States says that we have undertaken a new order of things I want to know how far the Government of the United States is going to interfere as a government with the normal, the natural, workings of the American character and of American institutions.

He then goes on to say that a part of our great progress under this administration consists in substantial benefits to our agricultural population, to increased industrial activity, and in profits to our merchants. What is there so surprising or new about that? Why, these achievements have existed in this Nation ever since it started, and I sincerely hope and pray that they will continue to exist in all the years to come.

Let us pass over to another statement:

In spite of our efforts, in spite of our talk, we have not weeded out the overprivileged and we have not effectively lifted up the underprivileged.

The President of the United States says we have not "weeded out the overprivileged." This is a fateful statement for the Chief Executive of this Nation to make. Whom does he mean by the "overprivileged" and how does he propose to weed them out? Is he going to weed them out by confiscation of their property? Is he going to weed them out by taxing them on a different basis than other citizens?

How is he going to weed them out, and who are the overprivileged? Let us ask a question or two. Supposing a gentleman is fortunate enough to have had intelligent ancestors who invested in real estate, we will say for example, on Manhattan Island, and now, without having lifted a finger in productive toil or produced a dollar, he is able to enjoy the privilege of a million-dollar yacht, a city mansion, and a country estate. Does the President hold this gentleman to be overprivileged? I think myself he is. But how, by fair and constitutional methods, are you going to get rid of him?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. Just for a question.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does the gentleman believe in taxing that man so that the men who do not have any income may live?

Mr. EATON. My answer to that is, I am not offering my solution of that difficulty. I am discussing a statement made by the President of the United States that we have to "weed out" those people.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman would not call it an injustice to tax them?

Mr. EATON. I do not call it an injustice to tax any man for the reasonable support of his Government. I hold that any American citizen who has the protection of this Government and who is able to produce anything worth while should bear a part of the burden of this Government, whether he be rich or poor.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. In the view of the administration, is any Democrat overprivileged?

Mr. EATON. The gentleman will have to ask the gentleman from Texas. He evidently considers himself underprivileged in his influence with this administration.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. Would it not help in weeding out the overprivileged to distribute some of the profits of the machines down to the common mass of people by putting in unemployment insurance, the 30-hour week, and old-age pensions?

Mr. EATON. I have long been in favor of unemployment insurance and have been instrumental in helping to put it into effect in industries with which I have been connected. I am in favor of old-age pensions, and I hold that the social implications involved in the invention of machinery are more important than the immediate economic effects of the machinery itself. For instance, in front of my house they are building a road. They have a machine there which tears up as much road as 200 men with picks and shovels. The machine costs $14,000. That machine has put 200 men out of a job. I hold when that machine was invented one of the chief purposes of the machine ought to have been to improve the condition of the 200 men instead of putting them out on the street.

Mr. HOOK. Does it not put them out of jobs without giving the profit to the man that owns the machine or equitably distributing it to the great masses?

Mr. EATON. The gentleman need not worry about profits, because there are not any now anywhere.

Mr. HOOK. They were taken away under the Hoover administration.

Mr. EATON. No. That is when there were profits. We have not had any since he left office. We are hoping to get some back after 1936.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Did the gentleman read the morning paper about an income-tax increase of nearly a million dollars?

Mr. EATON. If the gentleman will make a conspectus of that which he wishes me to read, I will attend to it after this speech is over.

I wish to close with what I think is the most important problem confronting the people of this country. As outlined in this address the President says, "The Federal Government must and shall quit this business of relief."

Mr. Chairman, I am not a novice, I am not a dreamer, and I am not a "new dealer." I have spent 20 years of my life in various industries of this country acting upon fixed principles for the distribution of wealth by higher wages, shorter hours, and improved conditions of wealth production. I believed that the industry of this Nation is the chief instrument of civilization. I believe so now. When this depression came on I believed that the center of the depression was the unemployment of people. We are never going to get a final solution of anything until we mass the brains and character of this Nation, regardless of politics or section, for the solution of this problem of employment. The President comes in here with a program to spend two, three, or four million dollars for relief by means of temporary work under Government control, under political control, and under political administration. I think that such a proposal is simply trifling with the problem. Mr. Chairman, I say that the problem of gainful employment for all employable people in America today goes to the very foundation of our civilization and of our future. Unless we can solve that problem we shall perish.

There are only two possible methods yet devised for solving the problem of unemployment. One is the method adopted in Europe whereby the government becomes everything and the citizen nothing. In the application of that method every liberty for which men have fought for a thousand years is sacrificed for the alleged purpose of securing economic freedom and economic security without appreciable successful result.

The other method is the American method, in which the individual operates under his own power and with only enough government to protect and control him. He enjoys the profits of his work and shares with his neighbors the opportunity for such profitable service. In our American plan the so-called "profit motive" is much more than a motive. It is the very essence of all legitimate enterprise.

One of these two principles must obtain and it cannot obtain if our Government is partly European and partly American. What, then, is our duty? I believe it is the duty of the President of the United States to call to Washington the business people of this country—the banking people, the labor people, and the members of this and other legislative bodies—and demand that we achieve a complete understanding and unity of purpose and objective.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In 1929 President Hoover called the business men of this country together and they promised to help out. What did they do? They returned to their homes and laid off thousands and thousands of people and cut down salaries. Did they keep their promise to President Hoover?

Mr. EATON. We had a gathering of bankers in this town a few weeks ago under the benign influence of the new-deal administration. It was a touching and lachrymose incident. The President of the United States went over and wept on their necks and they wept on his neck and then he expressed the hope that they would retain their confidence in the American people, whereas the fact is that the American people had lost confidence in them. Some of them are even losing confidence in him, I am sorry to say, and nothing came of the matter.

Then the great industrial leaders met down here at some health resort and drew up a program. It was sent up to the Government, and Mr. Hopkins hove bricks through it and called it names and it was put in the wastebasket. That is stupidity par excellence, and unless the business people of this country, the labor people of this country, the politicians of this country, the educators of this country get together in the interest of the United States of America, and not in the interest of any political party or any sect or section, we are going to enter into a new Dark Ages, and our great, glorious civilization, which has been the hope of the world for 150 years, will come to grief.

I do not believe that every business man in America is a criminal. I do not believe that every banker is a crook. Neither do I believe that all politicians are 100-percent pure. There is probably just as much stupidity and ignorance and inefficiency and selfishness among the politicians of this Nation as among any other class. But we still have the brains and the character, if we can find the will, to join hands in the interest of our beloved country and find an American solution of its problems.

In the light of present conditions this message of the President of the United States raises questions so vital, so central and far-reaching in their implications, that he ought to clarify them. He ought to tell us whom he proposes to weed out and how. He ought to tell us whether he is going to adopt the European or the American method of solving the unemployment problem. He ought to tell us whether or not he will now summon to his side the statesmanship, the business, the education, the finance, the labor of this country and unite with them to lift this Nation up upon the pathway of permanent progress. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, when my distinguished, attractive, and eloquent friend from New Jersey began his diatribe by expressing his admiration for the President, his satisfaction that he had cooperated in the last Congress, and affirmed his intention to continue such cooperation, I was led to the high hope that perhaps the millennium was coming, when we, as a body of legislators, might try to arrive at a proper solution of great problems without partisan consideration. But my hopes were very soon shattered, because he referred to the fact that the people of the country were losing confidence in the President, and then entered into a very critical discussion of the President's message to this body. I do not know upon what the gentleman bases his idea that the people of this country are losing confidence in the President. Certainly it is not upon results of the election in November. Certainly it is not based, sir, upon the sunlit faces and the hearty applause and the new hope that shines in the countenances of the American people whenever and wherever he moves out among the people of this country and speaks to them. Neither do I agree with the gentleman that the people have lost confidence in this body. They do criticize us at times, perhaps, and no doubt we often deserve that criticism, and I hope the day will never come when we are above the criticism of the people whom we represent. If we cannot take it, then we ought not to come here.

My friend finds principal fault with the President's message because, he avers, it is a little to the left and a little to the right and a little to the center. There, according to the gentleman, is a little for the sweet and a little for the bitter, and so on.

I can well understand that my distinguished friend, with his background and his contacts and his political philosophy, cannot understand any government that is trying to be operated for all the people—for the people on the left and the people on the right and the people in the center [applause]—and the gentleman has entirely missed a proper concept of the new deal and the new order, because that is exactly what it is. It is an effort on the part of the Government to give all the people—the people to the right, the people at the bottom, and the people in the middle, as well as the people at the top—a fair, square chance to enjoy some of the benefits of government. [Applause.]

Yes; it is a new order, and it is new just as surely as we live today, and it marches forward. I do not know, sir, whether the goal of economic prosperity and happiness lies in the center just straight ahead of us. I do not know whether we shall have to go more to the left or back to the right, but I believe I know one thing. I believe the goal to which we are driving is ahead of us and not behind us whence we came [applause], and I believe the American people look to the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt—not to Congress, not to the Democratic Party, not to the Republican Party—but look to the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, because of their confidence in the man, his sincerity, his high purpose, and his steadfast determination to put his administration above low, partisan considerations. They look to him; they do not look to us; and they follow him and they applaud him.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Am I to understand that the gentleman's position is that the great legislative branch of our Government has become simply a rubber stamp and that we might just as well go out of existence and not figure in the government of this Nation?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I do not say that, but I say that the outstanding figure, the leader, the man to whom the people look, is Franklin D. Roosevelt. They expect the national legislative body to cooperate, to scrutinize, and, now that the period of emergency is over, to give the Chief Executive the full benefit of their independent judgment in matters of vital concern. This is what we should do, and I believe this is what we shall do.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman answer this question: Is it possible for a rubber-stamp Congress to give independent judgment on these questions?

Mr. WOODRUM. If I thought this was a rubber-stamp Congress, I would go back home and starve to death with the rest of the lawyers trying to practice law. [Laughter.] I do not think it is a rubber-stamp Congress. I think during the period of this national emergency it has been quite proper for Congress to follow the President and yield to his judgment on emergency legislation. I do not think the legislative body lost any dignity by following and trusting this great leadership. That is what we have done. Members have their individual opinions, and now that the period of emergency has passed——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Has it passed?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the period of the emergency has passed—that is, the necessity for passage of emergency legislation—and I believe that the President feels that the time has come when we can take an inventory of what has been done, of the mistakes that have been made—and there may have been mistakes—and put into effect measures of permanent recovery.

Mr. EATON. I wish I could accept the gentleman's statement as true. But we have now 12,000,000 unemployed and a national debt of $35,000,000,000. I do not think we are out of the woods.

Mr. WOODRUM. I did not say that we were out of the woods. I think we were justified in the things that we did. We were 12 years under the leadership of the gentleman's party, and we were sinking lower and lower into the abyss from which we are trying to crawl out. [Applause.] What solution did the gentleman or his party offer for it?

Mr. EATON. I should like to make this observation that you say you are trying to lift the Nation up to the level of 1926, where it was under that inefficient Republican administration.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think that is right at all. I think the object of this administration is to try to pull back to an equilibrium economically in this country. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time, not for the purpose of discussing the independent offices appropriation bill but rather to discuss a subject that I believe is uppermost in the minds of many of our people. I think it fair to say that more of our people are thinking about the subject that I am about to discuss than any other piece of legislation that will come before the Seventy-fourth Congress. I have in mind the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the veterans of the World War. This piece of legislation is understood by many, but there are a great many people who feel that in passing legislation of this kind we are attempting to place the soldier upon a pedestal and say to him, "We are going to pay you compensation at the expense of the rest of the taxpayers of the United States." That is not true at all. As a matter of fact, every piece of emergency legislation which has been passed in the last two sessions of Congress has had for its objective the distribution of purchasing power, and what we intend to do through the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates is to use the soldier as a vehicle for the proper distribution of that purchasing power.

In normal times the law of supply and demand applies. If you have a supply of foodstuffs and manufactured articles in the country and, on the other hand, you have a demand for those foodstuffs and manufactured articles on the part of your people, automatically those two elements get together and create business. That is in normal times. These are not normal times, however. Today we have an ample supply of both foodstuffs and manufactured articles, so much so that the Federal Government has definitely embarked on a program of reducing production. On the other hand, we surely have the demand. Five million heads of families are on the relief rolls. These people are not eating as they would normally eat. They have not the clothing they would normally wear, and they have not the shelter they would normally have. So today, surely, we have the two elements of supply and demand. If the times were normal, they would get together and create business; but instead of getting together they seem to be as far apart as they were a year ago. The trouble is that the people who have the demand have neither the cash nor credit with which to buy the things they need. They have no purchasing power. The people of this country and you, the Members of Congress, realize that regardless of any achievements we may make in the wiping out of sweatshops, and that is very fine, in the line of guaranteeing bank deposits, which is also necessary, or in the line of reducing production, we are not going to have any semblance of normalcy unless we can get this basic law of the land, the law of supply and demand, to operate by distributing emergency purchasing power.

I am a great admirer of the President of the United States, although I am not of the Democratic Party. I have supported his program almost 100 percent. I feel, however, that he has been terribly misinformed and ill-advised as to veterans' matters. I will continue to support him, because I do admire him, and I do believe that he has a definite program and is trying to the best of his ability to carry out that program. I also believe that under his leadership we have made definite steps toward recovery in these United States. If there is a fallacy in the President's program, that fallacy is that the President has attempted to distribute this emergency purchasing power through the regular channels of trade, namely, the banks. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve System the Government has liquidated the banks, and the banks that are now open are liquid. I realize that it was the theory of the administration that if the banks were made liquid and had plenty of money on hand they would loan this money to individuals and corporations, and in that way establish pay rolls and distribute this much-needed purchasing power through the normal channels of trade; but it has not worked, because it is not practicable. The Government can liquidate the banks, but the banker dictates what further use is to be made of the money. The banks are not lending money on tangible values, and by tangible values I mean homes and farms and small businesses. Inasmuch as this effort to distribute purchasing power through the regular channels of trade has failed, then I know of but one practical way in which purchasing power can be distributed, and that is through the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the veterans of the World War. [Applause.]

We do not say that the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates is a cure-all for all our troubles—not at all—but we do say that it could very well supplement the extensive public-works program that we are going to undertake.

More than 4 years ago, when I was first elected to Congress, one of my first official acts was to urge the immediate cash payment of the adjusted compensation to the veterans of our Nation. Since that time the need for the cash payment has become increasingly greater and all arguments against the cash payment have collapsed.

During the past several years our Government has made strenuous efforts toward the restoration of normal conditions, and while relief has been provided to some extent, and while the foundation for recovery may have been laid, the fact remains that very little substantial gain has been made. Unemployment has not decreased in spite of all efforts to date.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED COMPENSATION WILL RESTORE NORMAL CONDITIONS

Regardless of cost, we have tried almost every scheme that has been suggested. We now demand that the one sound plan which has a real chance to correct the cause of our trouble be enacted—the immediate cash payment of the adjusted compensation.

The cash payment is urgently needed, it will pay a just debt to our veterans, it will be of enormous benefit to our Nation, it can be done without increased taxes and will in fact effect a saving to the Government of millions of dollars annually.

The cash payment is the one plan which holds real promise of restoring normal conditions to business and agriculture. After all, our problem is not merely to feed and clothe the needy, but to bring the country back to normal conditions, so that men and women and our veterans may again find opportunity and employment to adequately support themselves and their families.

Reduced to fundamental terms, our economic trouble is this: Our farms, mines, and factories can produce all we can consume, but our people, the consumers, have no money with which to purchase the products of farm and factory, and as a result both consumer and producer suffer alike.

Under normal conditions these two factors—supply and demand—balance each other, and the result is business, employment, and prosperity. The trouble is that we are now suffering from about 20 years of selfish human manipulation of the factors of supply and demand. Our trouble is entirely man made, and to contend that we cannot now correct these conditions is to admit that we are incapable of self-government.

It is true that in order to correct these conditions we may have to trample on the toes of a few special interests, but these special interests must submit and return to the people of this country some of the special privileges which have been granted them and discontinue the abuses which have accompanied the recent period of exploitation.

We believe most thoroughly in our American institutions and form of government, but it is time that the rules of the game should be changed so as to again give every man an equal chance and prevent the special interests from continuing to pauperize our veterans and every other class of citizens.

MUST TAKE PROFIT OUT OF WAR

We would today have no so-called "veterans' problems" if before we enter any war we would honestly figure its entire cost, including the care of our war disabled. War hysteria and the propaganda spread by war profiteers has blinded our Nation to the cost of its wars and to its obligation to our veterans. It is high time that we take the private profits out of war and squarely meet our obligations to the boys who served their country in our last Great War.

NATION OWES DEBT TO VETERANS

Our Nation and this Congress has been niggardly indeed in paying its obligation and expressing its gratitude to the boys who marched into the face of death to serve the flag they loved. It is already too late for us to compensate in a material way those brave men who have already left this life. We must not wait until other thousands of veterans have gone on before we discharge to them the small obligation represented by the adjusted compensation.

The investigation into war profits of the munitions makers shows clearly why they willingly enlisted in the World War. The munitions makers enlisted in return for billions of dollars in profits.

A Government which granted to one individual who faced no danger a profit of millions of dollars cannot refuse to the veterans who faced death itself the payment of their small adjusted compensation and retain any vestige of national honor.

While the munitions makers were piling up millions in profits, the soldier in the ranks was exposed to every form of danger and privation conceivable to war-crazed minds. This service he gladly rendered to his country without regard for his personal safety or welfare and all for a salary of $1 per day, most of which went to the support of his dependents. Can there be any justice in now refusing to pay the adjusted compensation to the veteran who served in the ranks?

NO COST TO TAXPAYERS

The cash payment of the adjusted compensation can be accomplished immediately and without cost if our Government will take back from the private interests our constitutional right of control over our monetary system. The special interests who were given control over our monetary system found it to be to their private profit to deflate our currency and credit system. This deflation continued to such an extent that in 1929 we were required to surrender 167 cents worth of value in payment for every 100 cents worth of debts.

For example, a recent study shows that our average annual tax bill—Federal, State, city, and county—amounts to $15,000,000,000. With a 167-cent dollar we were required to surrender $25,000,000,000 worth of value to pay the $15,000,000,000 tax bill. The same ratio applied with equal effect to all debts, public and private, as well as interest.

During the session of Congress just past we undertook monetary legislation which has served to reduce the commodity value of the dollar from 167 cents as of 1929 to 130 cents as of 1934. This is progress in the right direction, but what we must seek to do is further reduce the value of the dollar until a dollar represents 100 cents in commodity value and then maintain that value.

HUGE TREASURY SURPLUS LYING IDLE

As a further result of the monetary legislation undertaken in the last session of Congress, we find that the Treasury of the United States holds at the present time gold and silver to the value of $9,400,000,000. The total amount of currency in circulation as of December 1, 1934, was $5,516,000,000. This leaves a balance of $3,884,000,000 in gold and silver lying idle in the Treasury and useful to no one. Remember that while this almost $4,000,000,000 in gold and silver lies idle in the Treasury, the rank and file of our citizens suffer from want of a medium of exchange—purchasing power—and our producers have no market for their goods. Why, therefore, should we not use a portion of this idle four billions of dollars to pay to the veterans the adjusted compensation? The adjusted compensation is a just debt to our veterans, long ago acknowledged by our Government. It is also one of the most effective means of providing a large volume of purchasing power without delay, red tape, or partiality.

WILL DISTRIBUTE PURCHASING POWER

While, on the one hand, the payment of the adjusted compensation will reduce our funded debt, on the other hand, it will place an average of nearly $1,000,000 of cash purchasing power into every county in every State of our Nation. The great bulk of the purchasing power thus created will go directly into trade channels, where it will "turn over" at least two or three times immediately, with a resultant two or three million dollars worth of business in every county.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. WITHROW. The great value of increased purchasing power will be readily admitted if we will recall the substantial business revival which occurred during the C. W. A. period. That business revival was due to the purchasing power which was distributed at the grass roots by the C. W. A.

The purchasing power distributed by the C. W. A. was of great benefit, even though the C. W. A. program itself may have been encumbered by administrative detail, favoritism, and even graft. Think, then, how great will be the benefit of the cash payment of the adjusted compensation, which will distribute two thousand one hundred million in cash to the grass roots within 30 days and without administrative expense, favoritism, or graft. The C. W. A. helped by distributing four hundred millions spread out over a period of 90 days. The adjusted compensation will distribute two billion one hundred million in the short period of 30 days.

The result of this will be an immediate and almost miraculous increase in business and employment.

The bonus payment will not serve to benefit any one class alone. The veterans to whom this debt is owed represent a most complete cross section of our entire population. The money will be paid to farmers, merchants, business and professional men—men in all walks of life. Every business and industry will feel its benefit.

I said that the idle $4,000,000,000 in the Treasury is useful to none—in fact, this idle four billion does us a great deal of harm. It is the idle four billion that causes our dollar to retain its commodity value of $1.30 and prevents a dollar in currency from representing 100 cents in commodity value. The use of a portion of this idle four billion will serve, then, not only to pay a debt to our veterans and restore business and commerce but will also help to correct our monetary system.

I know that the reduction of the value of the dollar to the 100 cents on a commodity basis, and the utilization of the excess cash in the Treasury, will be regarded with horror by some as being inflation. It is in fact reflation, but even if it were inflation it would be an inflation which will have an immediate and beneficial effect, because it will be immediately reflected and enlarged in terms of purchasing power and commerce.

Let those who fear inflation look to the present activities of our Government. They will find a quiet and insidious inflation now taking place but without benefit to the rank and file of our citizens. Look to the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and you will note that the R. F. C. has been operating almost entirely on inflation. A small amount of bonds has been sold to the public, but the great bulk of R. F. C. money has come directly from the Treasury—three billion in notes of the R. F. C. and five hundred million on stock of the R. F. C. This money from the Treasury has been turned over by the R. F. C. to banks and railroads.

There can be no question but that the transaction of turning R. F. C. notes into cash is pure inflation. But it is inflation in favor of those special interests which shout most loudly against inflation, and therefore no protest has been made.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. Does the gentleman not believe that it is more to their concern who is getting the expansion?

Mr. WITHROW. There is no question about that.

Mr. DINGELL. That is the point involved.

Mr. WITHROW. There is no question about that. The R. F. C. poured money into the banks, where it stagnated, because the banks then failed to perform their functions as lenders and credit agencies and became mere depositories and money changers.

Inflation which pours money into the locked vaults of banks is of benefit to no one. I for one am opposed to any further devaluation of the dollar if all of the profit from this transaction goes into the locked vaults of banks or remains idle in the Treasury.

If, however, the additional purchasing power made possible by inflation is placed directly in the hands of veterans, in the hands of consumers, "at the grass roots", then there will be a direct and immediate benefit to the entire country.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Through that system of expansion of bank currency by the bond route, the Government pays interest on those bonds that are issued. Under the Patman bill for the payment of the soldiers' bonus there will not be any such interest paid. Does the gentleman not suppose that is another big reason why the money interests are so strongly opposed to the cash payment of the bonus?

Mr. WITHROW. There is no question about it.

DIRECT BENEFIT TO EVERYONE

The procedure which we propose through the adjusted-compensation payment would directly benefit the rank and file of the citizens of our Nation. The veteran, merchant, farmer, and professional man will get the direct benefits of increased purchasing power immediately.

The payment of the adjusted compensation gets to the root of our problem. It restores purchasing power directly to consumers.

I realize that this legislation has been threatened with a Presidential veto, but I call your attention to the fact that no just benefits to World War veterans have ever been granted except over the veto of the President who occupied the White House at the time the legislation was considered. The citizens of our Nation recognize our debt to our veterans and will no longer tolerate the treatment which has been afforded to our veterans in the past. The fact that overwhelming public opinion now demands the immediate cash payment of the adjusted compensation, even over the veto of the President, is proof sufficient of the merit of this legislation.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

VETERANS ASK ONLY FOR JUSTICE

Mr. WITHROW. The veterans of this Nation are asking Congress only for what is justly due them. They are not asking for charity. They know that they were "short changed" in the figuring of the amount due them when the Adjusted Compensation Act was passed in 1925. They know that the railroads and war contractors were paid in cash and at an interest rate double that of the veterans' adjusted compensation. They know that this debt was honestly due in 1931 rather than 1945, the present maturity date of the certificates.

The veterans of this Nation realize that the cash payment of the adjusted compensation this month or next month will be almost all that is needed to restore normal conditions to this country. They know that the money due them will give them a fresh start. They ask only for a square deal for veterans through the immediate cash payment of the adjusted compensation.

Every veteran, farmer, merchant, professional and business man has a right to demand that his Congressman and Senator support the immediate cash bonus payment because it is just, honest, and necessary.

I am certain that the people of Wisconsin and of the Nation do not intend that the banks, railroads, and other special interests who have received a substantial measure of relief from the Government shall receive preferred treatment, while the payment of this just obligation to our veterans is neglected.

The people of the State of Wisconsin make the just demand that the adjusted compensation be paid immediately. I back my people in that just demand and will fight for the cash payment to the last ditch. I call on the veterans of Wisconsin and of the Nation to actively join in this fight by getting in touch with their Congressmen, Senators, and the President.

In closing, may I remind you, gentlemen, that the American soldier has never failed his country. Others may have failed—diplomats, statesmen, financiers, and leaders—but our soldiers have always carried our glorious flag to victory in our hours of greatest need. They have never failed us. We must not fail our veterans now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discourse very briefly on the subject of the continuance of the activities of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I have in mind the introduction of a bill, and I want to do all I can toward the end that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation may be granted an additional $2,000,000,000 in bonds and $200,000,000 in cash for the payment of delinquent taxes and for remodeling of homes and buildings within the requirement of the original act.

In my city and State we have had some experience with the operation of the Home Loan Act. As a matter of fact, Michigan was second in the field in the total amount of loans obtained. I recall that prior to coming to the inaugural ceremonies of the President in 1933 I saw almost every day an unfortunate family out on the sidewalk, the mother with her babe in her lap and the youngsters surrounding her, sitting in the chairs in the midst of whatever of their possessions was set out there by the constable under a writ of eviction. The unfortunate father meanwhile was hopelessly and aimlessly looking for a job. Since the Home Owners' Loan Corporation came into being this condition in the city of Detroit has been entirely eliminated, as it has been eliminated quite generally in the State of Michigan.

The management of the H. O. L. C. has, it is true, in some instances been altogether too liberal in making loans, but the liberality was on the side of poverty and right. It is my impression that ultimately the H. O. L. C. will take care of itself without any loss whatever to the Government. I pray that I may never again see the day when the unfortunate people of my constituency are cast out into the streets.

In this Congress we have an opportunity of continuing this, perhaps the greatest institution of the last Congress, perhaps the most successful of all the agencies started by the Seventy-third Congress. It involves no additional cost or burden insofar as the Government is concerned, nor does it place a tax burden upon the people of the Nation. It does, however, give a new security to the man of whom the President thought when the new deal was inaugurated; it preserves the home with all that it means in this Nation. The preservation of the home, in my opinion, means the preservation of the foundation of this Government. It means stability; and my personal viewpoint is that, in spite of some of the deficiencies, in spite of some of the weaknesses of the physical structure or the dereliction of certain individuals, that the H. O. L. C. surpassed all expectations and must be continued. I shall cite a specific example why the life of this agency should be extended. I know there are countless examples which might be cited by every Member. An individual came to me who at one time was the recipient of a salary of about $100 a week. He purchased a home, for which he paid $16,000. Subsequently his salary was reduced to the point where he received only $45 a week, but he was steadily employed. It seems that a fraternal organization in the first instance had advanced the money on the mortgage. When the mortgage expired the fraternal organization needed the money and could not further extend it. They recommended that the mortgagor go to the H. O. L. C. The fraternal organization was willing to accept the Home Owners' Loan bonds. So he went to the H. O. L. C., but, due to the lateness of his application and the exhaustion of the resources of the Corporation, he could not receive assistance from this source, but in turn was referred to a bank as a good moral and financial risk. Now, the man was willing and able to make reduced payments, was anxious to retain his equity of $12,000, but he had to have his loan refinanced. He appealed to the banker, but the banker told him that they had altogether too many real-estate loans already and did not care for any more. So as a consequence of being unable to refinance with the original holder of the mortgage, inability of the H. O. L. C. to assist him, and the unwillingness or inability of the banker to make a loan, although, as I want to point out, the distressed property owner is a good moral and financial risk, this man stands at the point of losing his home, with no one to turn to for help. It seems to me the Government owes help to this class of people.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. Besides all the social aspects of this situation, we have a legal aspect, and many cases brought about like this: An agreement was reached between the man that owned the property and the man who owned the mortgage and they made the agreement because the mortgage had been taken over by the H. O. L. C. previously. It was the supposition that the agreement would go through and the Government would be the third party to that agreement. There are thousands of cases where an agreement has been reached because they thought the deal would go through. Now, if we discontinue this organization there will be thousands of agreements that have put both parties out and they cannot be carried through because of the failure of the Government as a third party.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. Chairman, because of the avalanche of protests which I received in my office from my people—and most of the Members have received them, too—I hastened to Washington on or about the middle of November and discussed the situation with Mr. Delano, General Manager of the H. O. L. C. He told me that it was the temporary policy of the Corporation under the circumstances to give the bankers an opportunity to see what they would do during the period of 60 days, of November and December, and then if the bankers failed to meet the situation something of necessity would have to be done about it by act of Congress. I ascertained that there were 900,000 applications which the Corporation could not take care of. In the light of past experience it is generally conceded that one-third, or 300,000, will be screened out without cost to the Corporation. That leaves 600,000 applications to be taken care of.

The average loan in the State of Michigan was about $2,800, but as a matter of safety we should apply an additional $200, making it $3,000. The 600,000 applicants will therefore require approximately $1,800,000,000 of additional bonds to be taken care of. It is my impression that the Congress should make provision for this amount during this session, and do so at the earliest possible moment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I asked Mr. Delano why it was not possible to proceed with examinations of all these applications now. He frankly told me it would cost about $40 per application, and with 600,000 applications on file it would involve payment of $24,000,000 out of the capital structure which is to be used for making loans to the present applicants; therefore, it is impossible for the Corporation, even though anticipating the favorable action of Congress, to make these examinations now. He did, however, assure me if Congress made sufficient provision to take care of the applicants without delay that the Corporation is in shape because of its trained personnel and past experience to proceed expeditiously to handle the applications at a most rapid rate and at a minimum of inconvenience to the distressed. We in the State of Michigan have been fortunate in that the Comstock administration passed a moratorium act which will save the home owner from being thrown out into the street until the H. O. L. C. can render aid. We have been advising our people who did not come in under the H. O. L. C. provisions and whose applications were not acted upon to take advantage of the Michigan moratorium act.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. In the event that an extension is granted and a new appropriation is made, should not those who have made application and whose application has been on file for almost a year have priority rights over new applicants?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes; and I presume that will be the policy of the H. O. L. C.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Is there no governmental policy so far in reference to this matter?

Mr. DINGELL. I understand that Mr. Fahey wishes an extension of the activities of the H. O. L. C. if the bankers do not take up the slack.

Mr. KELLER. But they do not.

Mr. DINGELL. They do not. I agree with the gentleman. I served notice on the Members of the House that I intend to introduce a bill to provide relief for all present eligible applicants. I must insist that the Government serve the people, especially so, since banks and mortgage institutions failed to extend the necessary relief. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, a few minutes ago, when I requested a Republican colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey, to yield to me, he declined to yield and at the same time suggested that I was possessed with superior wisdom, which, naturally, I disclaim. I am afraid my Republican colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey, indicated—at least he did to me—that he must have been suffering from political dyspepsia, judging from the manner in which he berated our party and our accomplishments.

I rise this afternoon to speak on the question of the Economy Act and to relate what it is doing to some of our veterans, whom I will describe as the "forgotten veterans."

Under the provisions of the present Economy Act the President is authorized to increase, decrease, or change the benefits to which our veterans and their dependents may be entitled. While it is my belief that the President desires to act humanely, nevertheless, I recognize that it is physically impossible for any individual to give sufficient of his time and energy to familiarize himself, personally, with questions as involved as those pertaining to veterans. For that reason the President must rely upon General Hines, and those associated with him in the Veterans' Administration, in discharging the responsibilities imposed upon him in the Economy Act.

UNIFORM PENSION LEGISLATION ESSENTIAL

It is my hope that this Congress will not adjourn without enacting a uniform pension law in which the rights and benefits to veterans will be predicated entirely upon legislative enactment.

I have some very pertinent facts which I should like to present to the Congress so that the Members will know what occurred when we enacted the economy bill. These facts are all embodied in documentary evidence which I have here in my possession.

Referring to the peace-time disabled veterans, whose pension awards are inadequate, I wish to call your attention to individuals who became maimed in service, in line of duty, and whose benefits were reduced from as high as $160 per month to as low as $34 per month. Would any here present suffer the loss of an arm for $34 per month? Another individual who lost his right hand in service has been reduced from $80 to as low as $6 per month. These are the rates which are being paid today.

Mr. KELLER. Did he lose his right hand in service?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes; this is a service-connected disability, incurred in peace-time service. I understand that the reason this individual receives only $6 per month is because he is employed by the Government in an insignificant capacity, but, may I ask, is such reduction to a maimed disabled veteran just?

I refer to another instance where a veteran was reduced from $150 to $45 per month under the provisions of the Economy Act. On September 30 of last year the award of $45 per month pension was also withdrawn, and the veteran today receives absolutely no pension nor compensation. I am personally acquainted with this comrade and visited him at his home. For the past 6 or 8 years he has been totally disabled and bed-ridden. He has a tube in his side and his widowed mother, who is without means of support, must give him constant care. A pathetic incident involved in this case is that while the veteran was in receipt of a fair pension award he amassed a small sum in a local bank, which sum was also lost to him through the failure of the bank, thus adding to his unfortunate plight. This veteran's compensation was reduced to $45 per month because he enlisted after the armistice. The $45 per month, which he received as a totally disabled peace-time veteran, was taken from him because the Veterans' Administration ruled his tubercular condition was presumptive. Certainly no individual in America, not even a member of the National Economy League, would countenance or approve of such inhuman consideration to a totally disabled veteran, and which, moreover, reacts so unfortunately upon his noble-spirited widowed mother.

The Economy Act removed approximately 13,000 veterans from the rolls as World War veterans and placed them in a category of peace-time veterans because of the Executive order establishing a different date as to the termination of the World War, notwithstanding that the official date is recognized as July 1921. This is a discrimination against this class of veterans which should be recognized and corrected by the Congress.

Another instance, of which I have documentary evidence, is the case of a Reserve officer who was totally disabled as a result of an airplane accident. For the past 2 years this young lieutenant has been in an Army hospital. For sometime his pay as a Reserve officer was continued, but for the past year he has received absolutely no compensation of any kind. Reserve officers, called into active service, who are totally disabled in such service, are assuredly entitled to more consideration than the small gratuity of $45 per month which today is the existing rate in such cases.

I refer further to enlisted men of the regular service, who entered the service with the intention to retire after having completed 30 years of active service. Numbers of these men, becoming injured or because of failing health after they have acquired credit for 25 or more years of service, are no longer able to perform active service and are, in many instances, summarily discharged. In recognition of their service and disabilities they may, if totally disabled, acquire title to a maximum pension of $45 per month, but this is usually accomplished only after long delays. Some of these individuals, personally known to me, are totally disabled because of airplane accidents or other physical hazards of the service. A number of such individuals served with distinction as officers during the World War. Nevertheless, under existing law, they receive no more consideration in reference to veteran benefits than does a recruit of 1 day's service. It is my contention that individuals in this category should be given retirement on the basis of their rank and years of service to thus save them from pauperism which follow their discharge and the award of an insignificant pension. To establish this principle would be merely giving the peace-time disabled veteran equal consideration with the civil-service employee, who after 5 years of service, if disabled, is entitled to retirement with one-thirtieth of the retired pay of a civil-service employee for each year of service rendered.

Another inhumanity in connection with the Economy Act is illustrated in the case of a veteran who served in the Philippines during the insurrection. As a result of such service he contracted leprosy, but was discharged as passive, or cured, from the Carville, La., leper hospital. He was receiving until recently $150 per month pension. He migrated to California and lived near my district. Because of increasing age and physical impairment the old malady (leprosy) began to assert itself. In addition, he became practically blind. Against his wishes he was returned to the Carville leper hospital and his pension was reduced from $150 to $15 per month. Our Government sent this man to the Philippines where he contracted leprosy and we now have him forcibly detained in the leper colony in Louisiana—yet we reduce his compensation to $15 per month.

Another instance of injustice on the part of the Government is that of hospitalization of the retired personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. All individuals in this group, many of whom served in as many as three wars, are denied entry to Veterans' Administration hospitals, even if disabled as a result of combat, except under emergency, and, even though emergent, they are not admitted to Veterans' Administration hospitals unless prior authority has been obtained from Washington. Under the classification covering entry to Veterans' Administration hospitals the retired personnel of the services are in the last category. Retired personnel who are seriously ill are only too frequently judged not emergent, and as a result many of them die before they can obtain hospital treatment through the Army or Navy hospitals—often at distant points—which are open to them. In this connection I wish to read an extract from a letter which speaks for itself and evidences the fact that the injustices of which I complain should be speedily corrected.

First Sgt. Archie Cooper, a member of the Ninth Cavalry, stationed at Fort Riley, Kans., was retired on the 31st of August. Arrived in Los Angeles on September 21. He was suffering from some cause which only the medical profession could explain, I not being familiar with such terms. However, I escorted him to the hospital at Sawtelle on November 9. They would not admit him because he was a retired soldier. He was sent to Letterman General Hospital on November 19, just 10 days after, and died there November 23, just 4 days after being admitted.

This comrade and others have been refused admission to Veterans' Administration hospitals with such statements as "Take him out of here. This is no place for retired enlisted men." There are other instances of this kind which have been submitted to me.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think the gentleman meant to give his voice the inflection he used in making that statement. The gentleman does not mean that this man was treated discourteously, but simply means that they have no authority under the law to admit such a man.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Replying to the gentleman from Virginia, I would say that in the instance just referred to no discourtesy was shown, but in another instance with which I am conversant arbitrary statements were made by the examining physician, for which he was severely reprimanded by the Veterans' Administration after a thorough investigation had been made of my report against him.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S DECISION INHUMAN, UNFAIR

Basically, this inhuman treatment, directed at the retired personnel, is due to a decision of the Comptroller General, who ruled that even though an officer or man may have served in two or more wars the mere fact that he is on the retired list precludes him from consideration as a "veteran", notwithstanding the fact that every enlisted man involved has been furnished with from one to three discharges from separate war periods. In my opinion, the Comptroller General ought to be a bit more human in his interpretation of the laws pertaining to the retired personnel and veterans of our wars.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does not the gentleman think the blame for that should be placed rather on the Congress than on the Comptroller General? After all, we should make the law clear enough to take care of the various matters as we want them taken care of, rather than put the blame on the Comptroller General.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman is correct, and under the provisions of the act of July 3, 1930, legislation was enacted annulling the decision of the Comptroller and clarifying the term "veteran." The Economy Act, however, repealed the act of July 3, 1930, and as a consequence the Comptroller General's decision again prevails.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is not the Comptroller's fault, but is the fault of Congress.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The Comptroller must be held responsible for his decision. I do believe, however, that the President, under the provisions of the Economy Act, can correct, by regulation, the Comptroller's decision as to what the term "veteran" includes.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman ought to make it clear that it is not the fault of General Hines or the Comptroller, but is because of congressional action or failure of Congress to take action.

Mr. HOEPPEL. With respect to the Economy Act, yes.

May I call the attention of the Committee to another instance of a most flagrant type of discrimination—that is, the discrimination predicated against the officers of the regular service who were retired because of wounds received in battle? We have 175 officers, if I recall correctly, who are retired from the service because of disability incurred in combat. These officers cannot enter a Veterans' Administration facility, even though they require treatment for a disability incurred in combat. General Hines states inferentially in a letter, which I have in my hand, that even though a veteran served only 1 day in the World War he is entitled to enter a Veterans' Administration hospital, but an officer who may have been wounded in France and who requires hospitalization for that specific injury is denied entry to a Veterans' Administration hospital, notwithstanding these officers are willing to pay to the Veterans' Administration the same amount of compensation for their maintenance that they would be required to pay if they entered an Army or Navy hospital.

A retired comrade who was admitted to the Veterans' Administration hospital at Boston under emergency, since admittance to the hospital has had both legs amputated well above the knees. Under existing regulations, notwithstanding that this veteran served in two wars, the Veterans' Administration will not furnish him with artificial limbs nor with a wheel conveyance. They will, however, furnish such appliances to a World War veteran who served only 1 day. This unfortunate veteran, with his low retired pay and a wife and family to support, and who is unable to purchase these appliances, must thus languish in the hospital minus both legs and far from the influence of his loved ones, because of the Comptroller's decision that veterans of two or more wars who are on the retired list are not "veterans."

Strange as it may seem, nevertheless it is true that while we deny an officer hospitalization in a Veterans' Administration facility, even though he requires hospitalization for disability incurred in combat, we do pay the widows of such officers a pension.

Another inhuman and expensive discrimination which ought to be corrected is that which pertains to admission to soldiers' homes. There is only one United States Soldiers'

Home and only one United States Naval Home in the United States where retired personnel of the Army or Navy may be domiciled; and, regardless of residence, if a retired individual desires to enter either of these homes, he must bear his own traveling expense, either to Washington or Philadelphia, even though he comes from as remote a place as the Philippine Islands to enter such home.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I thank the gentleman from Virginia for his courtesy and consideration.

In addition, if a retired individual is admitted to the United States Soldiers' Home here in Washington, D. C., he is compelled to pay a maintenance charge of $15.75 per month, even though in some instances his total retired pay and allowances, after 30 years' service, are less than $36 per month.

Another instance of discrimination is the requirement that officers and men on the retired list, if they become insane, are permitted to enter the psychopathic hospital here in Washington, D. C., only—St. Elizabeths. A recent case involved an officer who, becoming insane on the west coast, was transported to St. Elizabeths with attendants, and the attendants returned to the west coast, all of which was a needless expense to the Government, inasmuch as the Veterans' Administration maintains one of the most modern of psychopathic hospitals in the very shadow of the home of the patient. Thus, under the existing discrimination, the Government was forced to make unnecessary expenditures for transportation and, at the same time, the unfortunate officer was removed from the influence of family contacts and virtually isolated 3,000 miles distant from his home and relatives.

The same condition applies when retired personnel enter the Soldiers' Home here in Washington or the Naval Home at Philadelphia. This requirement is inhuman toward the veteran of 30 or more years' service and could be easily corrected in the interest of economy by reciprocal agreements or arrangements, or an Executive ruling that retired personnel of the services are to be considered as "veterans", and as such they would then have equality with all other veterans and be permitted to enter soldiers' homes nearest their places of residence.

OTHER INJUSTICES REQUIRING CORRECTION

In my opinion, pensions to widows and dependent parents of veterans whose death occurred in or as a result of combat should be increased. Likewise pensions to widows with dependents of World War and Spanish War veterans should be increased, as the amounts today received are inadequate.

An unfair decision of the Veterans' Administration, which rules that insurance payments received by a widow shall be classed as income, prevents many Spanish veterans' widows from receiving a pension, and is thus a penalty on thrift and even common sense. To be more specific, if a veteran is insured for $1,001, with a policy payable to his widow, and notwithstanding that this entire amount may be required to pay the expense of his final illness and burial, nevertheless, because the widow received payment of $1,001 on a life-insurance policy, she is denied pension for 1 year in accordance with the existing income-tax provisions.

Disability allowances should be restored to certain World War veterans who are less than 100-percent disabled.

The "causative factor", which removed many worthy emergency officers from the emergency officers' retired list, in my opinion, should be eliminated, or, at least, less drastically applied.

The present provision which reduces pension or compensation awards while veterans are temporarily in hospitals, in my opinion, should also be eliminated, although this provision may be justified in the case of veterans permanently domiciled in a soldiers' home. It perhaps would be more just, however, to the veteran involved if the per capita cost of domiciliary care were deducted from his compensation and the balance paid to him with the provision that no service-connected disabled veteran shall receive less than $15 per month while in such institution.

Spanish War veterans, and veterans who served in the Philippine Insurrection or the China Relief Expedition, with inadequate and even no medical facilities available to them, in my opinion, are treated the most unfairly of all war veterans. In a majority of instances, with no record kept of their disabilities during service, these men, 30 or more years after the termination of the war, are unable to establish service connection for their existing disabilities. It is my opinion that the disabilities of this class of veterans should be considered as service connected and that pension should be paid to them at the same rate which today applies to presumptive service-connected World War veterans; that is, a maximum of $75 per month for total disability.

In addition to discriminations within the Veterans' Administration, the Bureau of Internal Revenue also discriminates against our various veterans by exempting World War veterans from income tax on their compensation payments, while at the same time emergency officers, likewise disabled in war service, must pay income tax on their retired pay, and all veterans receiving pensions must also pay income tax on pensions received. For example, veterans with service-connected disabilities, who did not leave the United States, are exempt from income tax on their compensation whereas emergency officers, disabled as a result of combat, are required to pay income tax on their retired pay. This discrimination is flagrantly unfair and should be corrected.

Veterans borrowing on their life-insurance policies are required to pay interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum on such loans, which rate is higher than some private insurance companies exact of their policyholders. Inasmuch as the Government, through postal savings, lends more than $1,000,000,000 of postal savings to the private bankers, without security, at 2½ percent, it is obvious that when the Government exacts from its own veterans 6 percent on insurance loans which are fully protected, that interest rate is exorbitant and palpably unjust to this class of borrowers. It should be reduced to not more than 3 percent.

These and other discriminations directed against our peace-time and war-time veterans should be corrected, and could easily be corrected through the enactment of a uniform pension bill. I am introducing bills to correct some of the most glaring of these inequities and others which my limited time precludes me from enumerating; but, in the meantime, we must recognize that the only permanent solution of our legislative difficulties respecting veterans, and the only reasonable answer to their plea for a square deal, is the enactment of uniform pension legislation dealing with the problem on a strict basis of equity and which will forever remove the existing disgraceful discriminations that are a travesty on justice and an outrage to democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the new Members, who perhaps would not notice the fact unless it were called to their attention, that we have a Committee on Expenditures in the Government. It happens that I am ranking member of that committee on the minority side. Last year the committee did not investigate expenditures in the executive departments; it was apparently not thought wise to look into the expenditures of the administration. However, I am hoping that this session the committee will do a little of this work, for which it was created.

The gentleman from Texas has today very severely criticized one activity of the present administration, but criticisms of this nature were conspicuously lacking during the last session of the Congress. Because of the failure of this committee to function, I took several occasions to speak on the floor of the House relative to this subject, and you will recognize that it seems to be the only forum available for that purpose.

A day or two ago I made the statement that the President's message clearly said that in July our national indebtedness would be $31,000,000,000 and that by the following July it would be $35,000,000,000 and asked you to add thereto the contingent liability, which would probably increase this to thirty-six billion.

Because the gentleman from Wisconsin who preceded me is so sure—and because the Speaker in his admirable radio address a few days ago practically said that the President would in all probability lose out in the matter of the prepayment of the bonus—we must now also anticipate that an additional two billion will have to be paid, increasing the total indebtedness to thirty-eight billion by July 1936. And when we consider the scant progress toward recovery which we have made during the past 2 years, we may even look forward to an indebtedness of $40,000,000,000.

I take the floor at this time to discuss a few related matters. I am not in opposition to many of the recovery measures. I greatly favored the Home Owners' Loan Act. But why was politics played with human misery for 3 or 4 long months, when it was well known that the funds were about to be exhausted? Why were many applicants allowed to hope and to expect that they would be taken care of when it was known that the money was giving out? Why was notice of this delayed until a few days after the election? If my party had done that, we would have heard a lot from you about it. Perhaps, my own party might have done it; but we know the political master mind guiding your policies. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has said that the trouble with me is that I see a political side to many questions. Any man who has had to fight in an election like the recent one with his opponents in control of the F. E. R. A. war chest, and nevertheless tried to point out the dangers which he believed existed, and the failures that have occurred in recovery measures—in other words, to be a Republican—has had to show some courage in any part of these United States.

You say to us that you want to have something constructive presented. Well, you have had it lately, have you not? After all of this handing of the olive branch to the bankers, getting the business men to Washington and asking them to cooperate with something in the way of a constructive suggestion, did they not meet at White Sulphur Springs and formulate a definite program for recovery? Were there not many prominent Democrats among them, and did they not file a formal report and send it to the President, who is reported to have been too busy to see them, but who allowed Mr. Hopkins—the so-called "gay, impulsive Mr. Hopkins"—to ridicule it? I thank Mr. Frank Kent for designating him by that and other impressive names. I give Hopkins credit for being remarkably able, though he seems to care little about Congressmen. When he decides to grant relief, he does it as promptly and directly as possible. Evidently he would cut all red tape if he could. He is a very able man, but, oh, as Frank Kent said, "What a conceited ass!" Write him as polite a letter as possible, and you may not even receive a reply thereto. At least I did not, and mine were very polite letters.

The Congress has had to grant relief through him, but should we not have the right and the duty to investigate his policies and methods without being insulted? We have attempted in this country both to exalt the President of the United States and to place the entire burden upon him. But it sometimes seems to me that we desire that he shall take all the blame in case of failures so that we may, ourselves, be rid of possible criticism.

Those business men who were at White Sulphur Springs brought back a plan of real cooperation. It was handed to Mr. Hopkins and—to the delight of the newspapermen—he is reported to have said, "Don't make me cry." It evidently seemed a great joke to those familiar with his wisecracking. Mr. Ickes is also reported to have waxed sarcastic. Do they really want constructive criticism? No! My attention has been called to a forceful speech recently made by a prominent Republican, who stated that it is self-evident that the plan of the "brain trust" is that a sick, suffering, and despairing people should be kept in that condition until they shall finally be willing to accept anything, and "until our social aims are achieved."

I now refer to the President's recent message. He stated in effect that even if we may have failed in many of our objectives, at least "the morale of the Nation has been restored." But has it, indeed? What about the morale of the veterans who cry for the prepayment of the soldiers' bonus? They are now able to say, "If you can spend vast sums of money for all these other things, certainly you can pay this debt to us." I, for one, who have supported several Presidents in their opposition to this prepayment, am going to find that I have a difficult task to excuse myself for not voting for it now in view of the sort of other expenditures called for in that message. We are all of us to be placed in a most difficult position. No wonder that in California there is an Upton Sinclair with extraordinary views—who came very near to being adopted by the Democratic Party. No wonder there is a Dr. Townsend, who now suggests that everyone over 60 should receive $200 a month. A large number of our Senators and Representatives will be forced by the mass of the people to give consideration even to a proposal of that sort. The morale of the Nation has been preserved, indeed!

In fact, the mass of the people of this country has been awakened to the thought that the Government must care for them. The old doctrine that the Government should be supported by the people seems to have gone, and now in its place is the idea that things must be done by or through the Government to care for not only the needs of the people but their desires as well.

Those men who met at White Sulphur Springs had a trying and difficult task. They engaged in it with a serious and cooperative spirit. They were not there as "new dealers" or as "old dealers." But in place of their constructive business suggestions, comes a message that faith in recovery is to be placed chiefly in the further expenditure of $4,000,000,000 for more public works. Analyze this proposition, and you realize its futility. We cannot put those three and a half million unemployed to work on projects of this nature. A large proportion of the unemployables are not fitted for or able to engage in work of that sort. We read that in our own districts planning boards have already recommended large undertakings, such as the building of roads which will be wide race tracks for the future and would divert most of the traffic from established communities, where money has been invested in homes and businesses established by which an honest living—or at least a partial living—might be made by selling food and merchandise to the passers-by. This would be another blow to the small storekeeper and the owner of the wayside stand, already hard hit by the chain stores and other large monopolies of trade, which we patronize, even though we may curse them as monopolistic. Of course we patronize them, for they furnish goods more cheaply, but they do not purchase our local produce; and if the small stores are to be further hit, where will our people sell their merchandise?

And what of the present public-works system of giving employment? The other day I heard a man say, "I can win on a lottery ticket easier than I can get a job on these public-works projects. Contractors desire skilled labor, or at least what they can regard as efficient labor. Somehow I never can qualify."

The President seems to have recognized this and now recommends a different method. It is indeed difficult to criticize the present administration. Errors which have occurred are acknowledged and policies changed before a real chance for criticism is had. So in the case of these public works. What does the President say now? "This time the Government or governments will carry on the work, and it will not be done by contractors." Seemingly in the future political appointees are to carry out these projects. Have we not had about enough of political mechanisms as exemplified by the C. W. A.?

Our bureaucrats sneered at the recommendations of the business men that direct aid should be given the unemployed.

You gentlemen who have taken the floor today and are to do so later, advocating unemployment insurance, why do you not favor the present expenditures and the giving of direct aid, which might be dignified by the name of "unemployment insurance"? It would probably cost the Government 40 percent less than it costs under this Public Works program. E. R. A.! You know what it has been accomplishing in your districts. It is fine to have improved school grounds and water holes. It is fine to have ditches dug and leaves raked up. But now the President in his message admits that it was all wrong. "Let us build things for future generations."

Take those race-track roads of which I spoke. They may be good for the people in years to come, and even for us after we have relocated our communities, but will such things bring about immediate recovery? Now, if we pay the E. R. A. worker $12 a week for a job that is manufactured for him to do, will he be fooled? Will that restore independence and manhood to him, as is so often claimed? Will it make him feel under any less of an obligation merely because he is given work that may be of a more permanent nature? There may be a class of people in this country to whom this argument would apply, but I am one who has confidence in our people to the extent of believing that, given time to themselves, they would work to improve their own properties and thus themselves add as much to our national wealth. Would they not feel just as manly doing that if they were frankly told that the depression existed through no fault of theirs and were the recipients of financial aid to tide them over it under the name of unemployment insurance?

Yet the plea of the business men for this direct and less costly aid was brushed contemptuously aside. "Don't make me cry", said Mr. Hopkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. What has been your experience with regard to the expenditure of E. R. A. money recently, where they have decentralized the authority from the principal cities within your States and opened regional offices? Previously the man in charge of an E. R. A. project went to the local office and little delay ensued; but now these matters are first submitted to the smaller regional office, then to the State office, and then to Washington, and papers have to be made out in quintuplicate, with every question carefully answered and every proposition approved by a considerable number of Government inspectors and office employees, so that time after time weeks will elapse before the proposal is approved and the men actually set to work. Apparently no one has the authority to cut the red tape so essentially a part of a bureaucratic government.

Now they want to make it a governmental function to construct all public works in this slow, cumbersome manner.

I do not assert that in any democratic form of government you can proceed otherwise if the people are to be protected. But the Government should not embark in general business of this sort. It was never intended that it should.

I have the President's preelection speeches made in 1932. What reading they now make, in the light of what he has done since that election, although to be sure he prepared his alibi in advance. He must be given credit for having practically said then, "If it comes to a case of saving a people from starvation, I will abandon all these principles, including a balanced Budget, reduced taxes, fewer bureaus."

Marvelous speeches he made in favor of these things then. And, judged by those speeches, marvelous are the things he has done since election.

Do you really want Republicans to frame a constructive policy? No! No matter what we might advance, you would be contemptuous of it. It is our plain duty to point out what we honestly regard as the weaknesses, the failures, and the dangers in your program, of course; but we have also presented constructive programs for recovery. Indeed, I think that the Republicans might be glad to accept almost unchanged the platform of your own Democratic State convention held in Georgia on October 4. What have you to say about that? The great State of Georgia, a Democratic State never before known to criticize a President of that party, held this convention, and the keynoter said, "While the motives of the President are white as the driven snow, and while we are pleased that he has made Georgia his second home"—and then went ahead to repudiate everything in the new deal. The demand was made that the dollar be stabilized at once and that there be a stop to spending money. Then, right after the election, as I read in the press, the Governor of the State of Georgia, with certain other Governors, succeeded in prevailing on the President and Mr. Hopkins to issue an edict that hereafter the same wages will be paid for Federal work as are paid for similar work of a private nature in each locality. I pleaded on the floor of the House last year that that be done, and how I was criticized for so doing! There were echoes of it in my own campaign when the statement was made that I was unwilling for the laboring man to be paid 45 cents an hour.

We know that in the South employers have been accustomed to get labor at rather cheap rates, living expenses being relatively low, and we can well understand how the whole private industry of that section was disrupted when the Government suddenly stepped in and paid so much more than the prevailing wage scale under the E. R. A. If I may be "political", a gentleman from Georgia said to me on one occasion, "If the Republicans had done that, a Republican would not dare to live in Atlanta." I was not surprised. Now that this has been accomplished and labor is not to be paid so much by the Government down there, perhaps they will feel less bitter about other phases of the new deal, however.

Replying to the gentleman from Texas and others who are criticizing the administrators of the new deal, especially those in charge of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, I would say that probably these men are doing the best they can, being merely bureaucrats under orders. One man who served the President almost as no other man ever did, who served with more force and energy than any other person of whom we know—and how he did crack down on business!—General Johnson, now freed from the chains of loyalty, has recently written an article which all of you should read and enjoy. I have it here and should like to read it all, but it is available to everyone. In it he says:

> We have the wealth; we have the courage; we have everything but just one thing.
